

The Brave Little Firefly

An original bedtime story for ages 4–7. Reading time: about 4 minutes.

Kids Book Videos

In a green, green forest, where the trees tickled the clouds, lived a little firefly named Flick.

Flick had a tiny light on his tail. It could glow and glow and glow.

But Flick was afraid of the dark.

"Oh no, oh no," Flick whispered every evening, when the sun went to sleep. "It is too dark. Too, too dark!"

So Flick hid under a big leaf and waited for morning.

One night, his friend Mira the mouse came tapping, tap-tap-tap.

"Flick! Flick!" she squeaked. "I lost my way home. It is so dark, I cannot see my toes!"

Flick peeked out from under his leaf. The forest was dark, dark, dark.

"I am scared too," Flick said in a small voice.

But then he looked at Mira's worried face. And something warm wiggled inside him.

"Hold my wing," Flick said. "I will try."

Flick took one deep breath — in... and out... — and let his little light GLOW.

First it glowed a little. Then a little more. Then — twinkle, twinkle! — it glowed bright and warm like a tiny lantern.

"Oh!" said Mira. "I can see the path! I can see my toes!"

Step by step, glow by glow, Flick lit the way through the dark forest. Past the sleepy flowers. Over the giggly stream. All the way to Mira's cozy little home.

"Thank you, Flick!" Mira hugged him tight. "Your light is the bravest light I know."

From that night on, Flick still felt a little scared when the sun went to sleep.

But now he knew a secret: being brave does not mean you are not scared. Being brave means you glow anyway.

And every evening, when the dark came, Flick flew up, up, up — and lit the forest with his brave little light.

Twinkle, twinkle. Glow, glow, glow.

Moral: Everyone has a special gift. Being brave means trying, even when you feel scared.

The End