Faye was a small deer fawn. She lived at the edge of the whispering woods. Faye had white spots on her back. She had long, wobbly legs. Every evening, the fireflies held a dance. They twirled over the meadow. They glowed and spun. Glow, twirl, glow! All the young animals danced. The rabbits hopped. The mice twirled. But Faye only watched. She wanted to dance too. But her legs felt too wobbly. What if she tripped? What if everyone laughed? Faye felt shy. Her ears drooped. "I will just watch," she whispered.

Her friend Lumo the firefly zipped over. He glowed bright and warm. "Why so still, Faye?" asked Lumo. "My legs are too wobbly," said Faye. "I cannot dance like the others." Lumo glowed a little brighter. "There is no wrong way to dance," he said. "Dance your own dance, dear." "Dance your own dance, dear." Faye repeated it softly. "Dance your own dance, dear." It became her twirling song. "Dance your own dance, dear."

Lumo called his firefly friends. They formed a glowing circle. "Dance in the middle," said Lumo. "Just the way you like." Faye stepped into the circle. Her legs wobbled. She swayed left. She swayed right. It was not like the rabbit hop. It was not like the mouse twirl. It was Faye's dance. Sway, step, sway. The fireflies glowed brighter. "Beautiful!" they buzzed. Faye felt brave. She felt joyful. She twirled as best she could.

Can you dance like Faye? Sway left. Sway right. Now a wobbly twirl! Dance your own dance, dear. Soon the rabbits joined her sway. The mice tried her wobbly twirl. Everyone danced Faye's dance. The meadow glowed with light. The music of crickets played. Chirp chirp chirp. Faye laughed out loud. She was not shy anymore. Her wobbly legs were wonderful.

When the moon rose high, the dance slowed down. Faye curled in the soft grass. Lumo rested on a leaf nearby. "Best dance ever," glowed Lumo. "Thank you," whispered Faye. She closed her eyes. She felt the fireflies' gentle light. Glow, sway, sleep. The crickets played a lullaby. And Faye drifted into a dreamy, dancy sleep.

Moral: Dancing your own way is the most beautiful dance of all.
