

Tide and the Little Wave

An original bedtime story for ages 4–7. Reading time: about 4 minutes.

Tide was the littlest wave in the whole wide ocean.

All the big waves rolled in tall and foamy.

Crash! went the big waves.

Tide only went lap, lap, lap.

She felt small.

"When will I be big?" she asked her mama, the sea.

"Soon enough, little one," said Mama Sea.

"For now, just be you."

One morning, a tiny crab was stuck on a rock.

The tide was going out.

"Oh no," said the crab. "I cannot get back to the water!"

He felt scared.

Tide heard him.

She felt brave.

She gathered all her littleness together.

She rolled forward, lap, lap, lap.

She reached the rock.

She lifted the little crab gently.

"Hold on," she whispered.

She carried him back to the deep water.

Plip went the crab as he splashed in.

"Thank you, little wave!" said the crab.

"You saved me! You saved me! You saved me!"

That was three times he said it.

Tide felt proud.

She felt big inside, even though she was small outside.

After that, Tide was not sad about being little.

Little waves could do kind things too.

She lapped at the sandy shore.

She tickled the toes of a giggling child.

She rocked a sleepy seashell.

Lap, lap, lap.

As the sun went down, the ocean grew calm.

Mama Sea sang a slow, slow song.

Hush, little waves, hush.

Tide's rolling grew slower.

And slower.

And slower.

The stars came out and twinkled on the water.

Twinkle, twinkle, twinkle.

Tide yawned a salty yawn.

She curled into Mama Sea's arms.

Sleep now, little wave.

Dream of gentle lapping on soft, warm sand.

Moral: Being small never stops you from doing something kind.
