Reggie the raccoon woke up to a wonderful smell. Warm bread. Sweet honey. It drifted through his window. He felt hungry and curious. Where was it coming from?

He followed his nose outside. Down the lane, a tiny shop glowed golden. A wooden sign read: THE NIGHT BAKERY. The door was round, like a cookie.

Reggie peeked inside. An old owl wore a floury apron. She kneaded dough with her wings. "Welcome, little one," she hooted. "I bake for dreamers."

"Bake for dreamers?" asked Reggie.

"Every night, I bake moon-buns," said the owl. "They are warm and soft. Children eat them in their dreams. The buns make dreams sweet."

Reggie felt amazed. "Can I try one?" he asked.

"Of course," said the owl. "But first, you must help. Moon-buns need patience."

Reggie watched her knead. Push, fold, push, fold. The dough was soft as a cloud. Reggie helped shape the little buns. His paws got all floury.

"Bake soft, bake slow, watch the moon-buns glow," sang the owl.

They slid the buns into the warm oven. The bakery filled with golden light. The buns began to glow softly, like tiny moons. Reggie felt warm all over.

"Bake soft, bake slow, watch the moon-buns glow," sang the owl again.

Ding! The buns were ready. The owl gave Reggie the warmest one. He took a bite. It tasted like honey and starlight. It was the yummiest thing ever.

"Bake soft, bake slow, watch the moon-buns glow," sang the owl one last time.

Reggie felt sleepy suddenly. The warm bun had made him drowsy. The owl wrapped him in a floury apron like a blanket. She rocked him gently.

"Time for you to dream, little baker," she hooted. "The moon-buns are done. Your dreams are waiting."

Reggie closed his eyes. He dreamed of a bakery in the clouds. He baked star-shaped cookies. He shared them with all his friends.

Sleep now, little raccoon. The Night Bakery will keep glowing. Dream sweet dreams of honey and starlight.

Moral: Helping make something warm fills your own heart with warmth too.
