Daisy was a little duckling.

She lived by the blue pond.

One morning, she woke up grumpy.

The water was too cold.

Her breakfast seeds were too small.

Her feathers felt too fluffy.

"Nothing is good today," she quacked.

Mama Duck swam beside her.

She said, "I see you feel grumpy."

Daisy nodded.

"It is okay to feel grumpy," Mama said.

"But let us try the thank-you game."

"The thank-you game?" asked Daisy.

"Name three good things," Mama said.

"Thankful hearts feel light as feathers."

"Thankful hearts feel light as feathers," she said again.

"Thankful hearts feel light as feathers," she said one more time.

Daisy thought hard.

"One," she said. "The sun is warm on my back."

"Two," she said. "The water holds me up."

"Three," she said. "You are here with me."

Mama Duck smiled.

Daisy felt something shift.

The grumpy feeling got smaller.

The thankful feeling got bigger.

She looked around with new eyes.

The pond sparkled like diamonds.
A butterfly danced over the reeds.
Her friend splashed and laughed.
The clouds looked soft like cotton.
The breeze smelled sweet and fresh.
"Thank you, pond," Daisy whispered.
"Thank you, sun."
"Thank you, Mama."
That afternoon, Daisy played happily.
She dived and splashed.
She chased shiny ripples.
Every splash felt like a giggle.
At bedtime, Mama tucked Daisy under her wing.

"What are you thankful for tonight?" Mama asked.

"My warm nest," said Daisy.

"Your soft wing."

"And this whole day."

Mama kissed her head.

Daisy felt grateful.

She felt light as a feather.

The pond sang its sleepy song.

Lap, lap, hush.

Daisy closed her eyes.

She was thankful.

She was loved.

Goodnight, Daisy.

Moral: Naming what we are thankful for turns a grumpy day bright.
