Tara was a little tiger cub.

She loved playing with her friends.

One afternoon, the others started a game.

They did not call her name.

They ran off without her.

Tara felt left out.

Her heart felt small.

Her eyes felt stingy.

"They do not want me," she thought.

She sat behind the big rock.

She wanted to cry.

Mama Tiger found her there.

She said, "I see you feel left out."

Tara nodded.

Tears rolled down her cheeks.

"It is okay to feel left out," Mama said.

"That feeling hurts, and it matters."

She wrapped Tara in a warm hug.

Then she said something gentle.

"Feelings want to be told, not hidden."

"Feelings want to be told, not hidden," she said again.

"Feelings want to be told, not hidden," she said one more time.

Tara wiped her tears.

She walked to her friends.

Her paws felt shaky.

"I felt left out," she said quietly.

"I wanted to play too."

Her friend Zed looked surprised.

"We did not see you!" he said.

"We thought you went home."

"We are sorry, Tara."

They made room in the circle.

"Come play!" they said.

Tara joined the game.

They played tag until sunset.

Tara ran fast.

She laughed loud.

She felt included.

She felt happy.

That night, Tara told Mama everything.

"I told them how I felt," she said.

"And they listened!"

Mama smiled.

"You were brave with your feelings," she said.

Tara snuggled into her warm den.

She felt left out earlier.

Now she felt loved.

The jungle sang its night song.

Hush, hush, little one.

Tara closed her eyes.

She belonged.

She was loved.

Goodnight, Tara.

Moral: When we feel left out, telling someone kindly can open the circle again.
