Tiana loved rainy mornings.

She sat by the window with her chin on her hands.

She felt curious.

The rain tapped on the glass.

"Tap, tap, tap," said the rain.

Tiana tilted her head.

"Why do you tap, rain?" she asked.

"Tap, tap, tap," said the rain.

Tiana felt puzzled.

She asked her mama.

"Mama, why does the rain tap?"

Mama smiled.

"The rain is saying hello to the world," said Mama.

"It is washing the leaves and waking the flowers."

Tiana liked that idea.

She pressed her ear to the window.

The rain tapped again.

"Tap, tap, tap," said the rain.

This time Tiana tapped back.

Tap, tap, tap went her fingers.

She felt giggly.

The rain seemed to tap faster, like it was laughing.

"Can you sing, rain?" asked Tiana.

She hummed a soft little tune.

Hmm, hmm, hmm.

The rain pattered in time with her hum.

Pitter-patter, pitter-patter.

Tiana felt happy all the way down to her toes.

She had wanted to play outside.

But this was a game too.

It was the listening game.

Tiana listened for the loud drops.

She listened for the quiet drops.

She listened for the drops that went plip and the drops that went plop.

Then the tapping grew softer.

And softer.

And softer.

The rain was getting sleepy.

"The rain is finishing its song," whispered Mama.

Tiana nodded.

She felt sleepy too.

The clouds began to open.

A small sunbeam peeked through like a shy smile.

Tiana yawned a big, soft yawn.

She curled up on the cushions.

The last drops went plip, plip, plip.

Then everything was still and clean and quiet.

Sleep now, little listener.

Let the rain's song rock you gently.

Close your eyes and dream of soft, tapping rain.

Moral: Listening closely can turn a rainy day into a song.
