Kiki was a playful kitten.

She loved to run and pounce.

One afternoon, her friend Beni the bunny built a sandcastle.

It was tall and beautiful.

It had three towers.

It had a tiny shell flag.

Kiki ran past too fast.

CRASH!

Her tail knocked the castle down.

Sand flew everywhere.

Beni felt upset.

His ears drooped.

Kiki felt sorry.

Her tummy felt twisty.

Her cheeks felt warm.

"I did not mean to," she whispered.

Beni turned away.

Kiki sat very still.

She wanted to run away.

But Mama Cat had taught her something.

She remembered, "Sorry heals when we say it true."

"Sorry heals when we say it true," she said to herself again.

"Sorry heals when we say it true," she said one more time.

Kiki walked slowly to Beni.

She looked at him gently.

"Beni, I am sorry I broke your castle," she said.

"I ran too fast. I will be careful."

Beni looked at her.

His ears lifted a little.

"Thank you for saying sorry," he said.

"It made me feel better."

Then Beni smiled.

"Want to build a new one with me?" he asked.

"Yes!" said Kiki.

They built it together this time.

Kiki carried the sand slowly.

Beni shaped the towers.

They made four towers now.

Even taller than before.

They put the shell flag on top.

It was the best castle ever.

That evening, Kiki told Mama Cat everything.

"I said sorry," Kiki said proudly.

Mama Cat hugged her close.

"Saying sorry takes courage," she said.

Kiki purred softly.

She felt sorry earlier.

Now she felt light and happy.

The moon rose over the garden.

Kiki curled into her warm basket.

She closed her eyes.

She was forgiven.

She was loved.

Goodnight, Kiki.

Moral: Saying sorry with a true heart can fix more than the mistake.
