Rory was a young raccoon.

His best friend was Dottie the duck.

One day, Dottie got a new red scarf.

It was soft and bright.

Everyone said, "What a pretty scarf!"

Rory felt jealous.

His chest felt tight.

His smile felt wobbly.

"I want a red scarf too," he thought.

He did not feel happy for Dottie.

He felt grumpy instead.

Dottie noticed.

"Do you want to try it on?" she asked.

Rory shook his head.

He sat under the bush alone.

Mama Raccoon found him there.

She said, "I see you feel jealous."

Rory nodded slowly.

"It is okay to feel jealous," Mama said.

"Feelings are like clouds. They pass."

Mama sat beside him.

She said, "Jealous is just wanting. It does not make you bad."

"Jealous is just wanting. It does not make you bad," she said again.

"Jealous is just wanting. It does not make you bad," she said one more time.

Rory breathed out.

The tight feeling loosened a little.

"What can I do?" he asked.

"You can tell Dottie how you feel," Mama said.

"And you can be glad for her too."

Rory walked back to Dottie.

"I felt jealous of your scarf," he said.

"But I am glad you have it."

Dottie smiled big.

"Thank you for telling me," she said.

Then she did something kind.

She gave Rory her old blue scarf.

"It is yours now," she said.

Rory wrapped it around his neck.

It was soft and warm.

He felt happy.

Really happy.

That night, Rory wore his blue scarf to bed.

He thought about Dottie.

He felt glad in his heart.

Glad for his friend.

Glad for himself.

The moon glowed through the leaves.

Rory closed his eyes.

He was cozy.

He was kind.

Goodnight, Rory.

Moral: Jealous feelings shrink when we name them and feel glad for others.
