One afternoon, the rain stopped all at once.

Little Rafi ran to the window.

He felt hopeful.

And there it was.

A rainbow stretched across the sky.

Red, orange, yellow, green, blue, and purple.

"Wow," breathed Rafi.

He felt amazed.

He counted the colors.

Can you count them with him?

One, two, three, four, five, six.

Six colors!

Rafi had a question.

"Where does the rainbow end?" he asked his dad.

"Let's find out," said Dad.

They walked to the park.

The rainbow seemed to touch the big hill.

"There!" said Rafi. "The end of the rainbow!"

He felt excited.

They climbed the hill.

But the rainbow had moved.

Now it touched the tall trees.

"Come back!" laughed Rafi.

He felt giggly.

They walked to the trees.

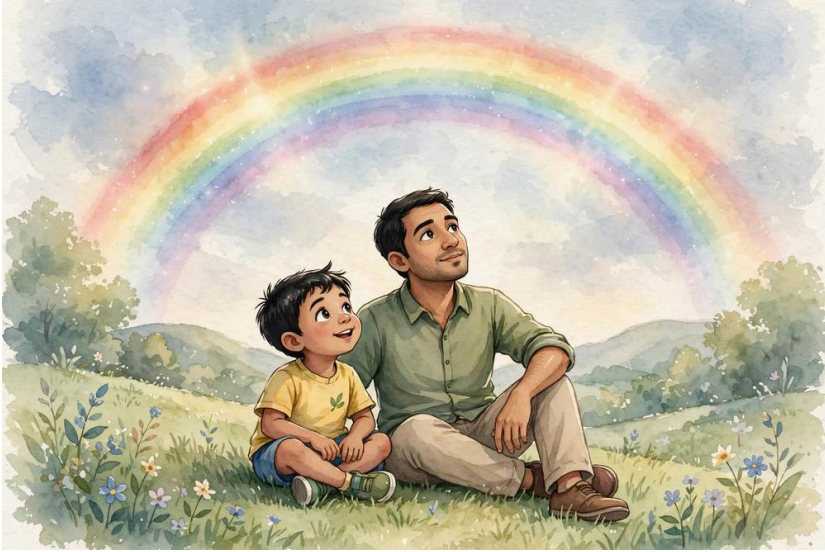

But the rainbow moved again.

Now it touched the clouds.

Rafi felt puzzled.

"Why can't we reach it, Dad?"

Dad smiled.

"A rainbow is made of sunlight and rain," he said.

"You cannot touch it, but you can always see it."

"It is a promise that the storm is over."

Rafi thought about that.

He liked the idea of a promise in the sky.

"A promise, a promise, a promise," he whispered.

That was three times he whispered it.

He felt calm.

They sat on the grass and watched.

The colors glowed softly.

Red like apples.

Yellow like the sun.

Blue like the sea.

Slowly, the rainbow began to fade.

The colors grew paler.

And paler.

And paler.

"Goodbye, rainbow," said Rafi.

"Thank you for the promise."

He felt peaceful.

That night, Rafi drew a rainbow in his notebook.

Six colors, in a perfect arch.

He put it by his bed.

Sleep now, little color-counter.

Dream of rainbows arched over green hills.

Moral: *Some beautiful things are meant to be watched,
not caught.*
