Kavi found a big red button in his grandpa's sewing box.

"What's this for?" he asked.

"It's a balloon button," said Grandpa with a twinkle.

"Press it, and see."

Kavi felt curious.

He pressed the button.

Pop!

A giant hot-air balloon appeared in the yard.

Red and yellow, big as a house.

"Hop in!" said Grandpa.

Kavi felt excited and a little nervous.

He climbed into the basket.

Grandpa climbed in too.

Up, up, up they floated.

The house grew small.

The trees grew small.

The whole town grew small.

"Wow, wow, wow," whispered Kavi.

That was three times he whispered it.

He felt amazed.

They floated over the river.

It sparkled like a silver ribbon.

They floated over the fields.

They looked like a green patchwork quilt.

"Can we touch a cloud?" asked Kavi.

Grandpa steered the balloon close.

Kavi reached out.

The cloud felt soft and cool, like cotton candy
without the sugar.

He felt giggly.

Then Kavi saw something below.

A lost kite was tangled in a tree.

"Grandpa, can we help it?" he asked.

He felt worried for the kite.

Grandpa lowered the balloon.

Kavi reached out and gently freed the kite.

"Fly free," he whispered.

The kite soared up, happy again.

Kavi felt proud.

As the sun began to set, Grandpa said, "Time to go home."

The balloon drifted down, down, down.

It landed softly in the yard.

Pop! went the balloon, back into a button.

Kavi held the button tight.

"Best ride ever," he said.

He felt sleepy.

That night, Kavi put the button under his pillow.

He dreamed of floating over rivers of silver.

Sleep now, little flyer.

Dream of red and yellow balloons in a pink sky.
