Chiku Shares His Acorns

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

Chiku was a little chipmunk who lived in Willowmere Wood, with a pile of shiny acorns. Ten acorns. He counted them every day — one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten. They were all his.

One chilly morning, his friend Suri the squirrel came by, looking hungry.

"I lost my acorns," Suri said softly. "My store is empty."

Chiku felt unsure, his tummy tight. He loved his acorns. He did not want to share.

Mama Chipmunk saw his face. "I see you feel unsure about sharing," she said.

Chiku nodded.

"It is okay to feel unsure," Mama said. "Sharing is hard at first." Then she said something kind: "Shared joy grows, kept joy just sits."

"Shared joy grows, kept joy just sits," she said again.

"Shared joy grows, kept joy just sits," she said one more time. Chiku looked at his ten acorns. He looked at hungry Suri. He picked up one acorn. Then another. Then one more.

"Here," he said. "Three for you."

Suri's eyes went wide. "Thank you, Chiku!" she said.

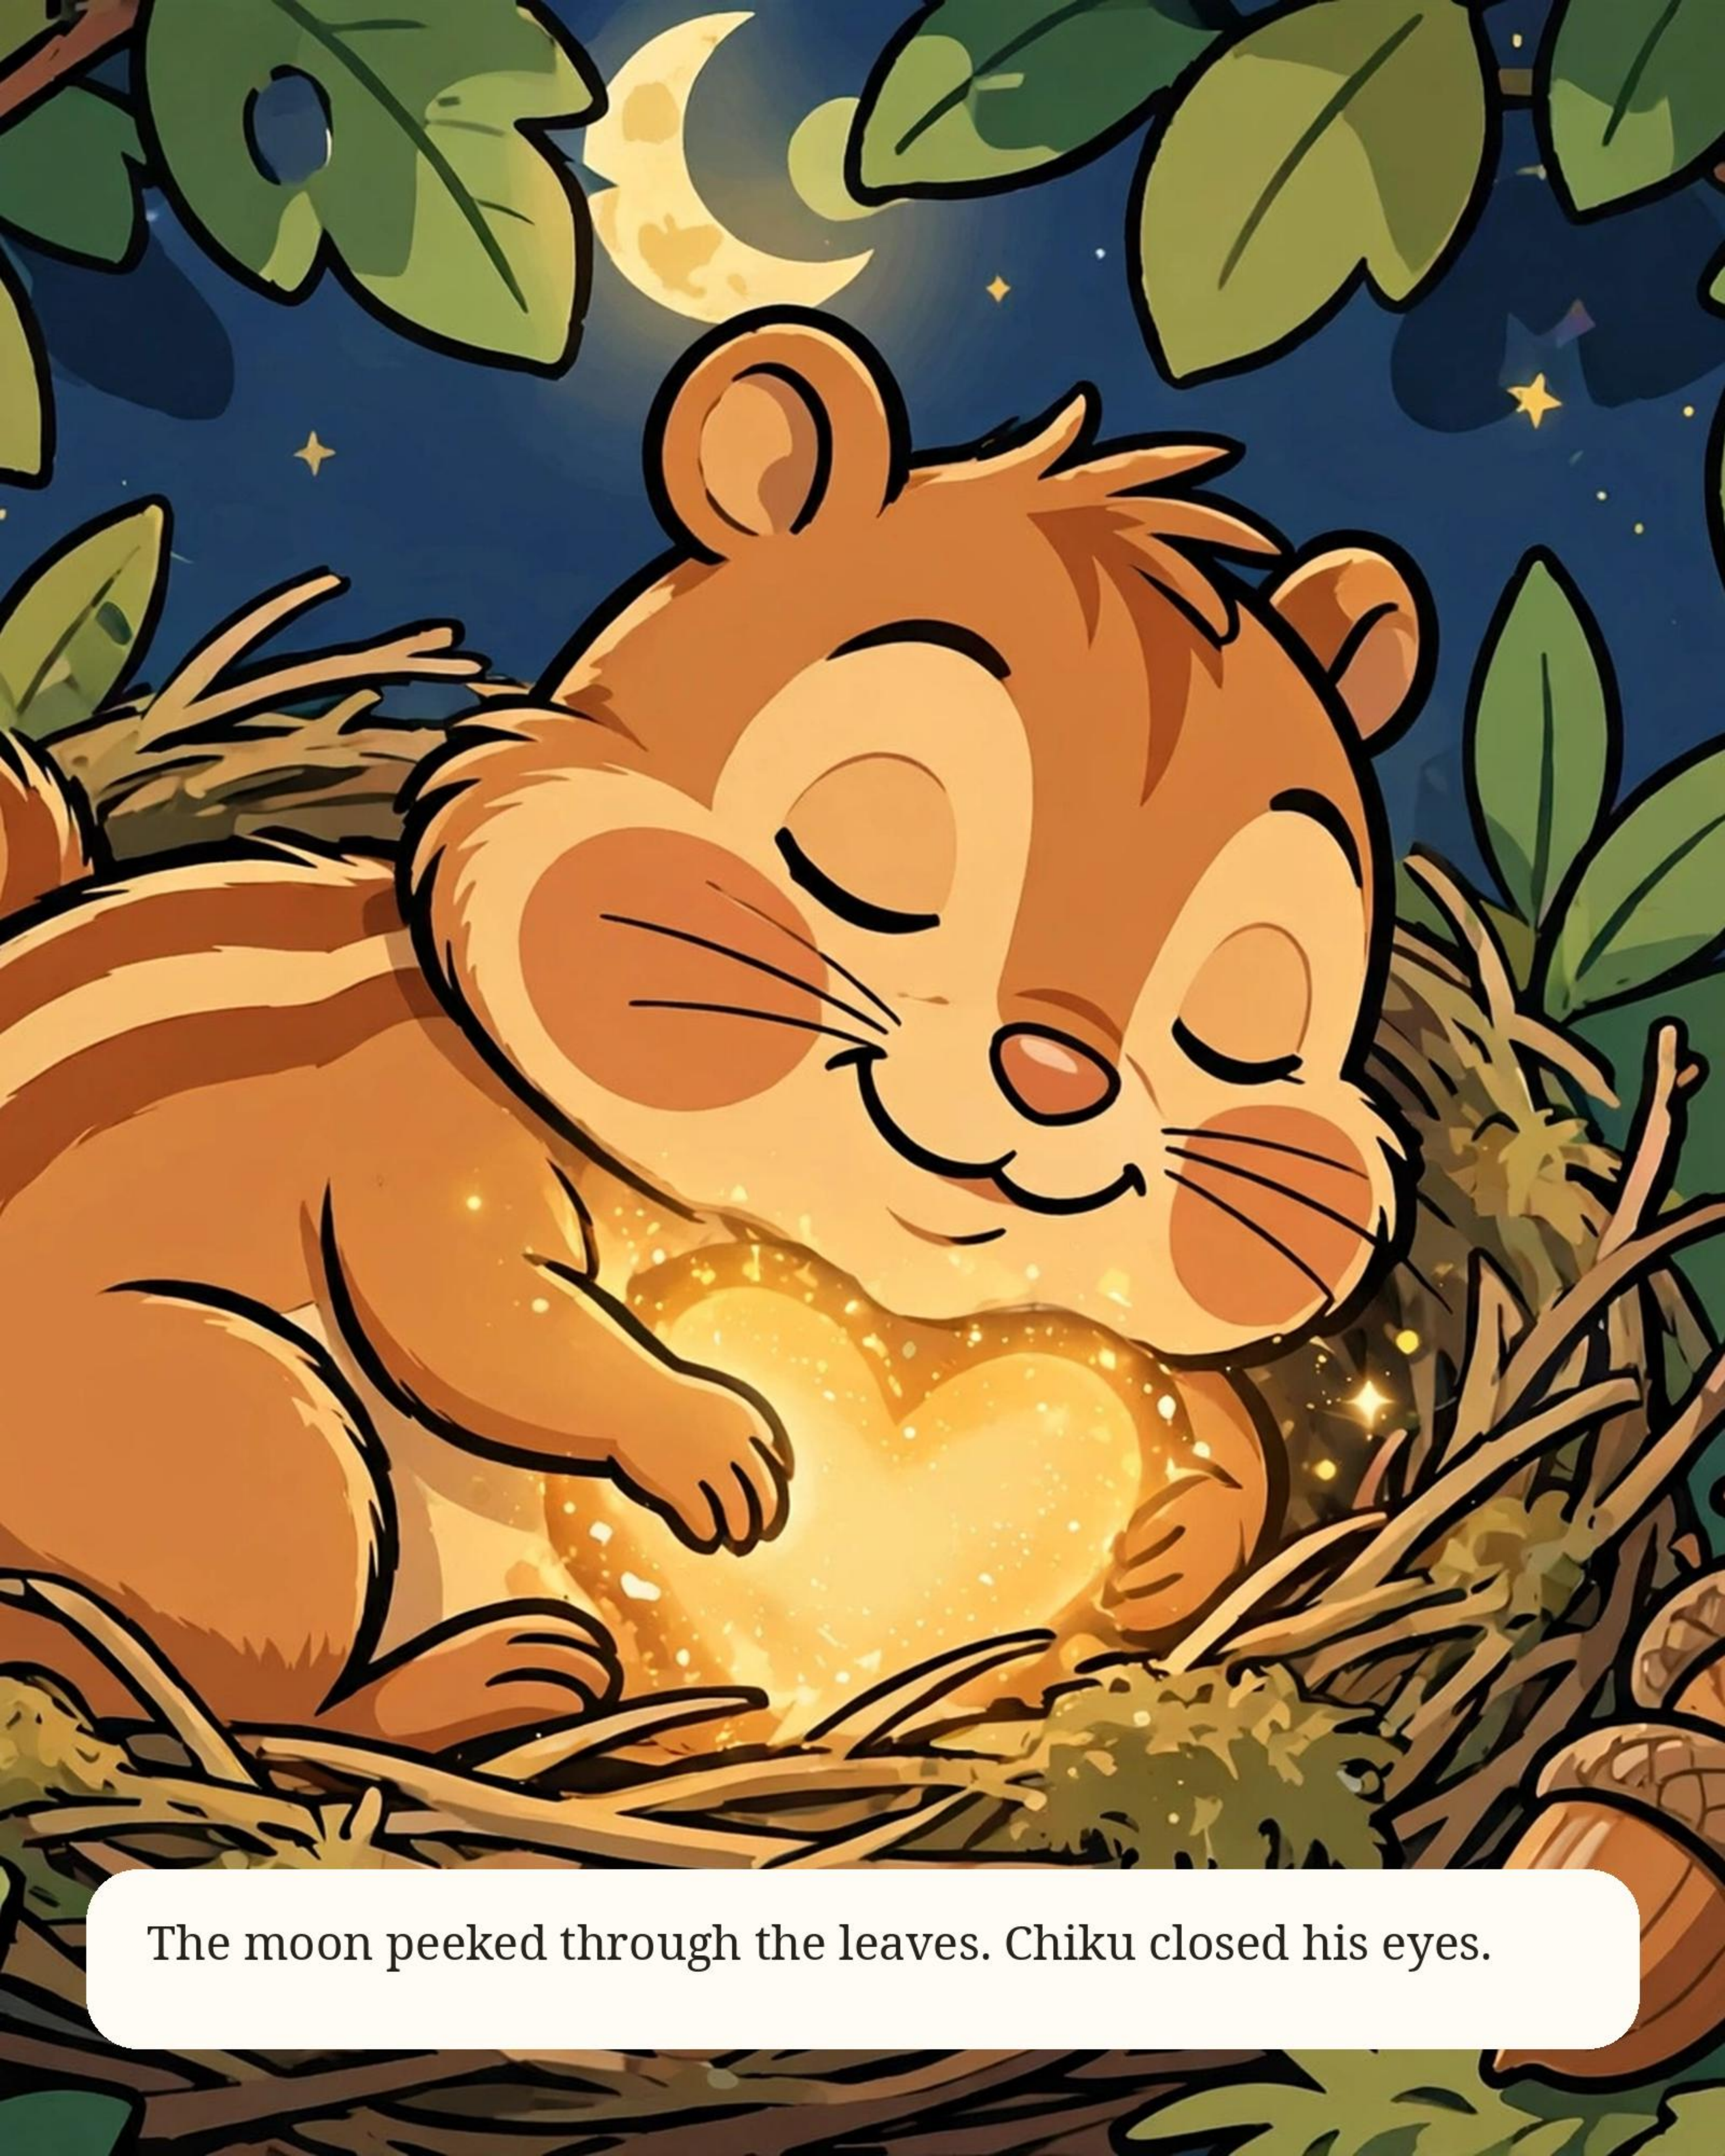

They cracked the acorns together. Crunch, crunch, crunch.
They tasted extra yummy.

Chiku felt something warm in his chest — a happy, glowy feeling. Sharing felt good. Better than counting alone.

That afternoon, they played together. They raced around the Old Apple Tree, laughing and laughing. Chiku still had seven acorns, but he had something better: a happy friend.

That night, Chiku snuggled into his warm nest and thought about Suri's smile. He felt the glowy feeling again. He was kind. He was loved.

The moon peeked through the leaves. Chiku closed his eyes.

Sleep now, little Chiku.

Sleep now, little Chiku.

The End
