The Brahmin and the Goat

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

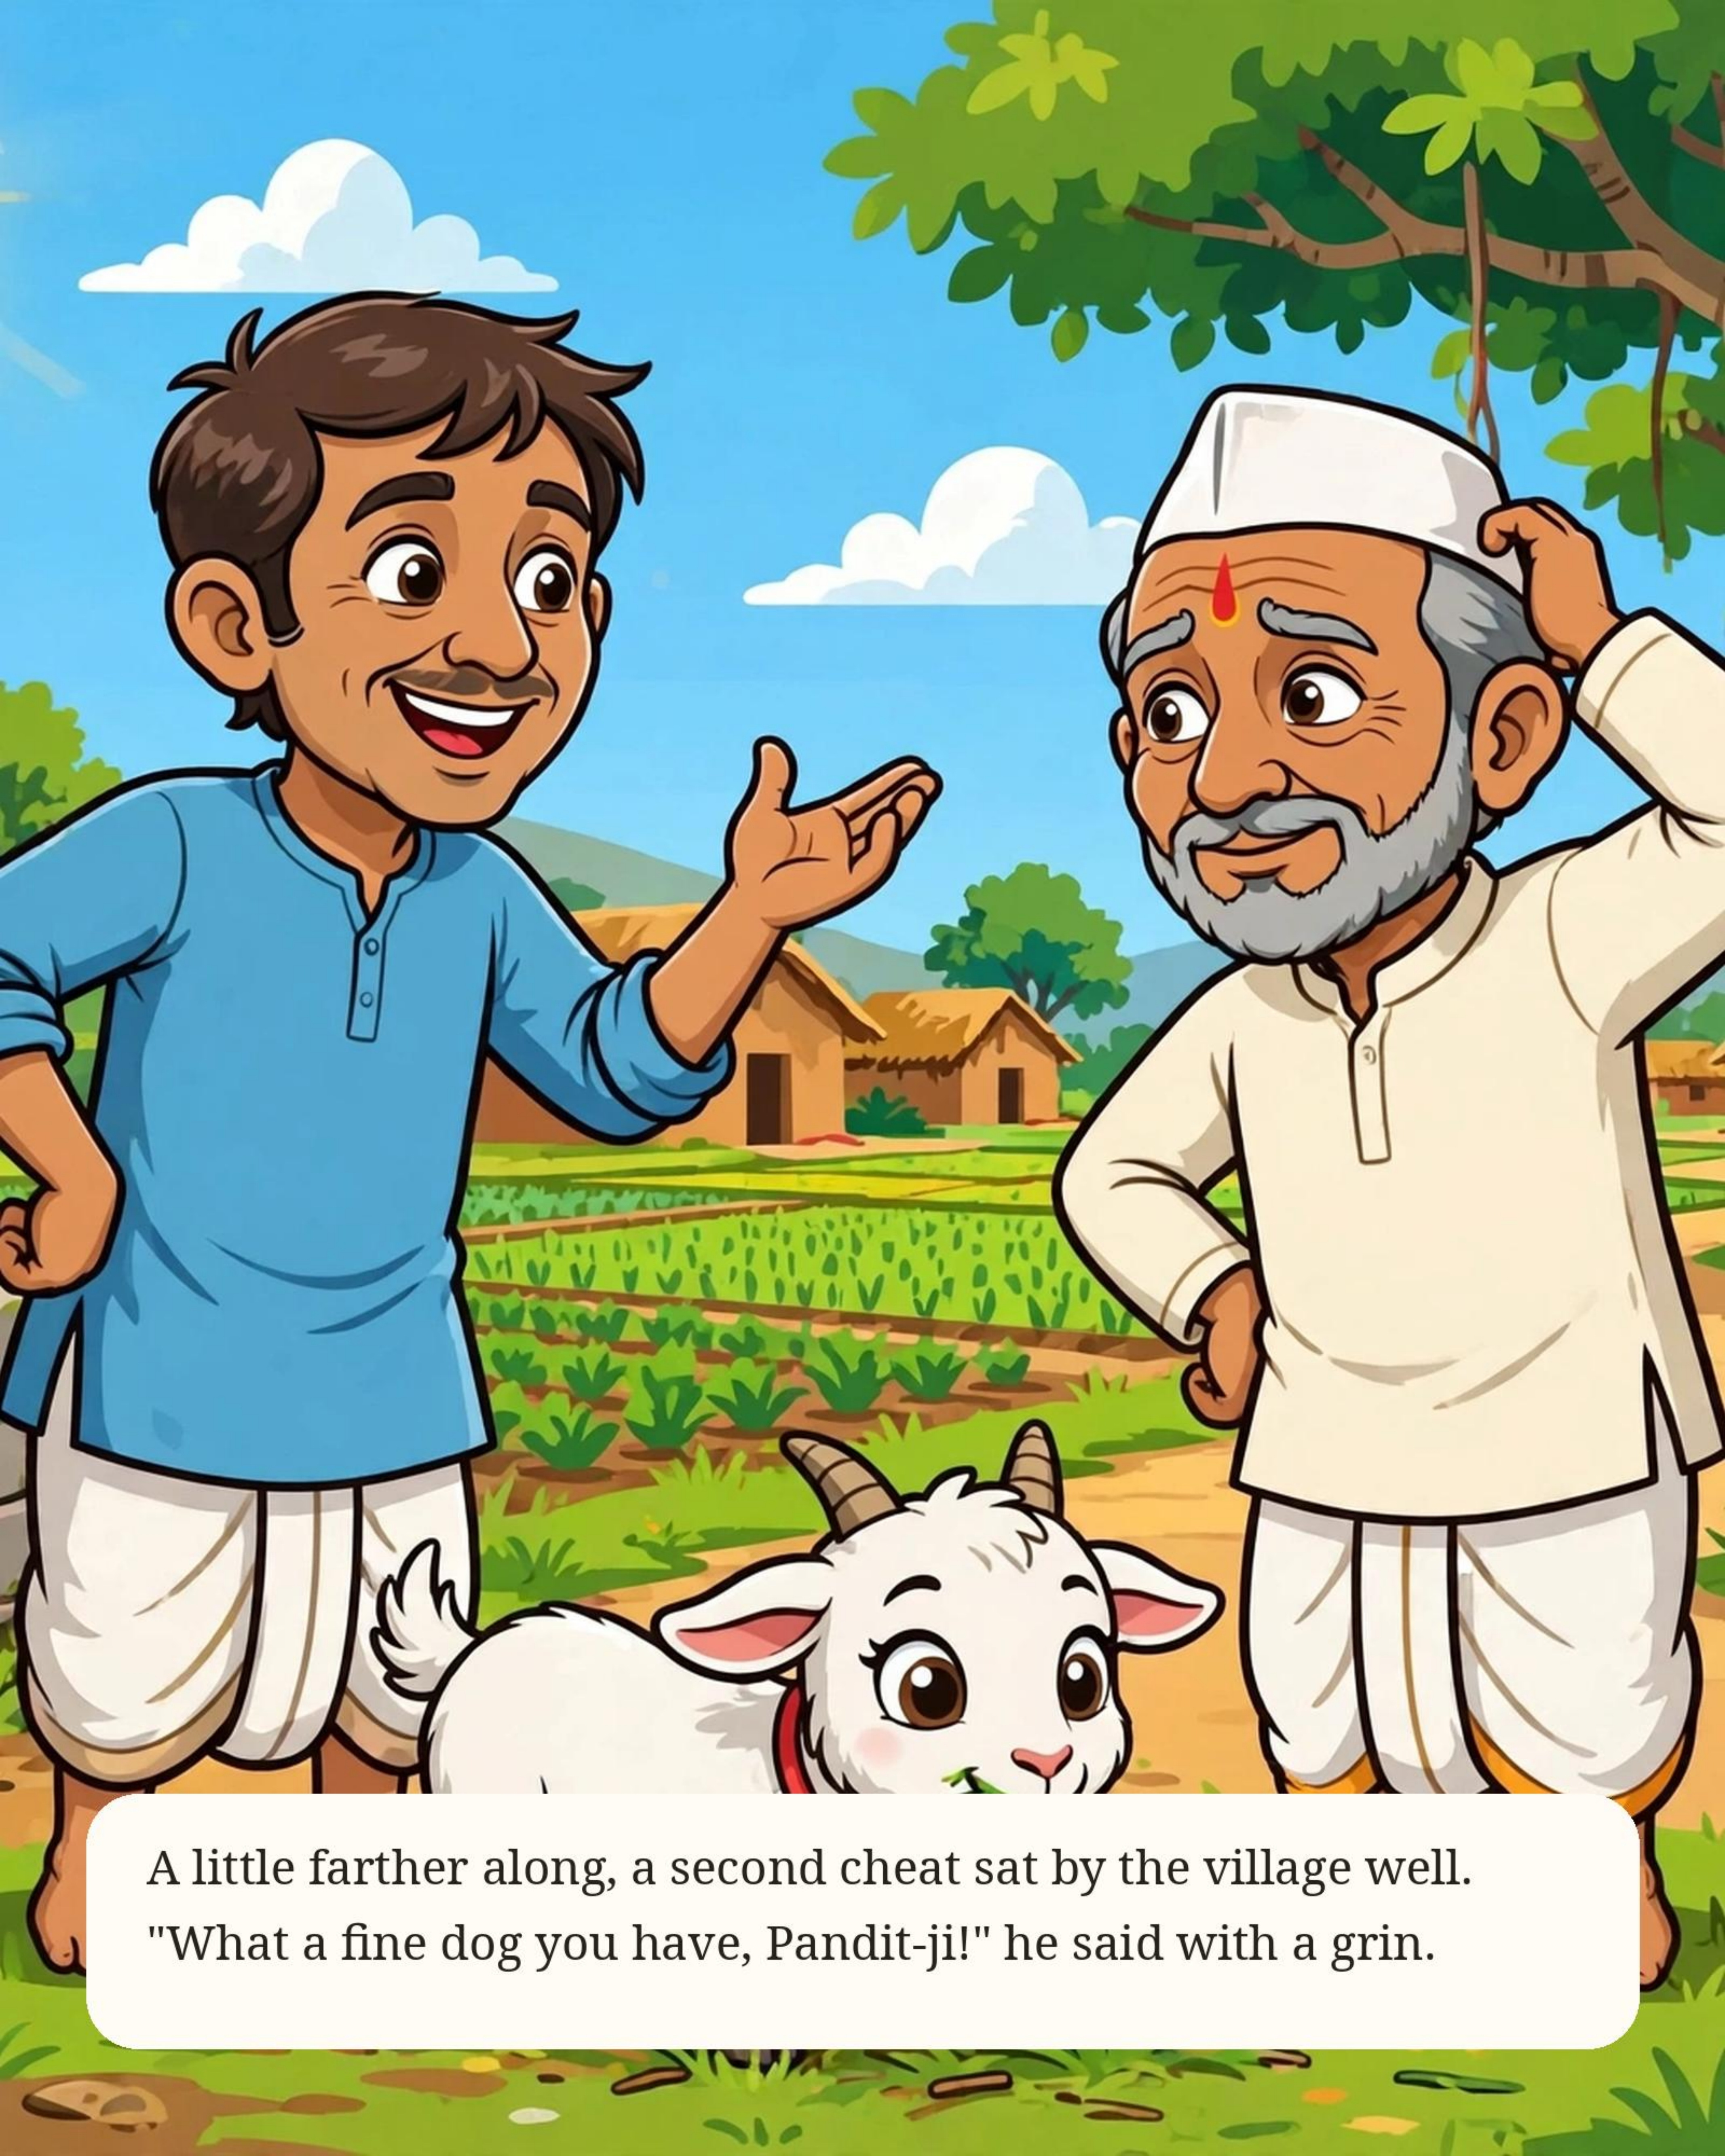

In a little village beside the green fields lived a kind brahmin everyone called Pandit-ji. One sunny morning, a friend gave him a fine young goat as a gift. "Take her home, Pandit-ji," said his friend. "She will give you sweet milk every day."

Pandit-ji was very happy. He lifted the little goat onto his shoulders and set off down the long road home. But behind a big banyan tree hid a sneaky cheat. As Pandit-ji walked past, the cheat called out, "O Pandit-ji! Why are you carrying a dog on your shoulder?"

"A dog?" laughed Panditji. "You must need new glasses! This is a goat." And he walked on.

A little farther along, a second cheat sat by the village well.
"What a fine dog you have, Pandit-ji!" he said with a grin.

Pandit-ji frowned. He set the goat down on the road and looked at her closely. Four legs, a little beard, tiny horns — a goat, plain as day. "My eyes are fine," he said, and lifted her up again.

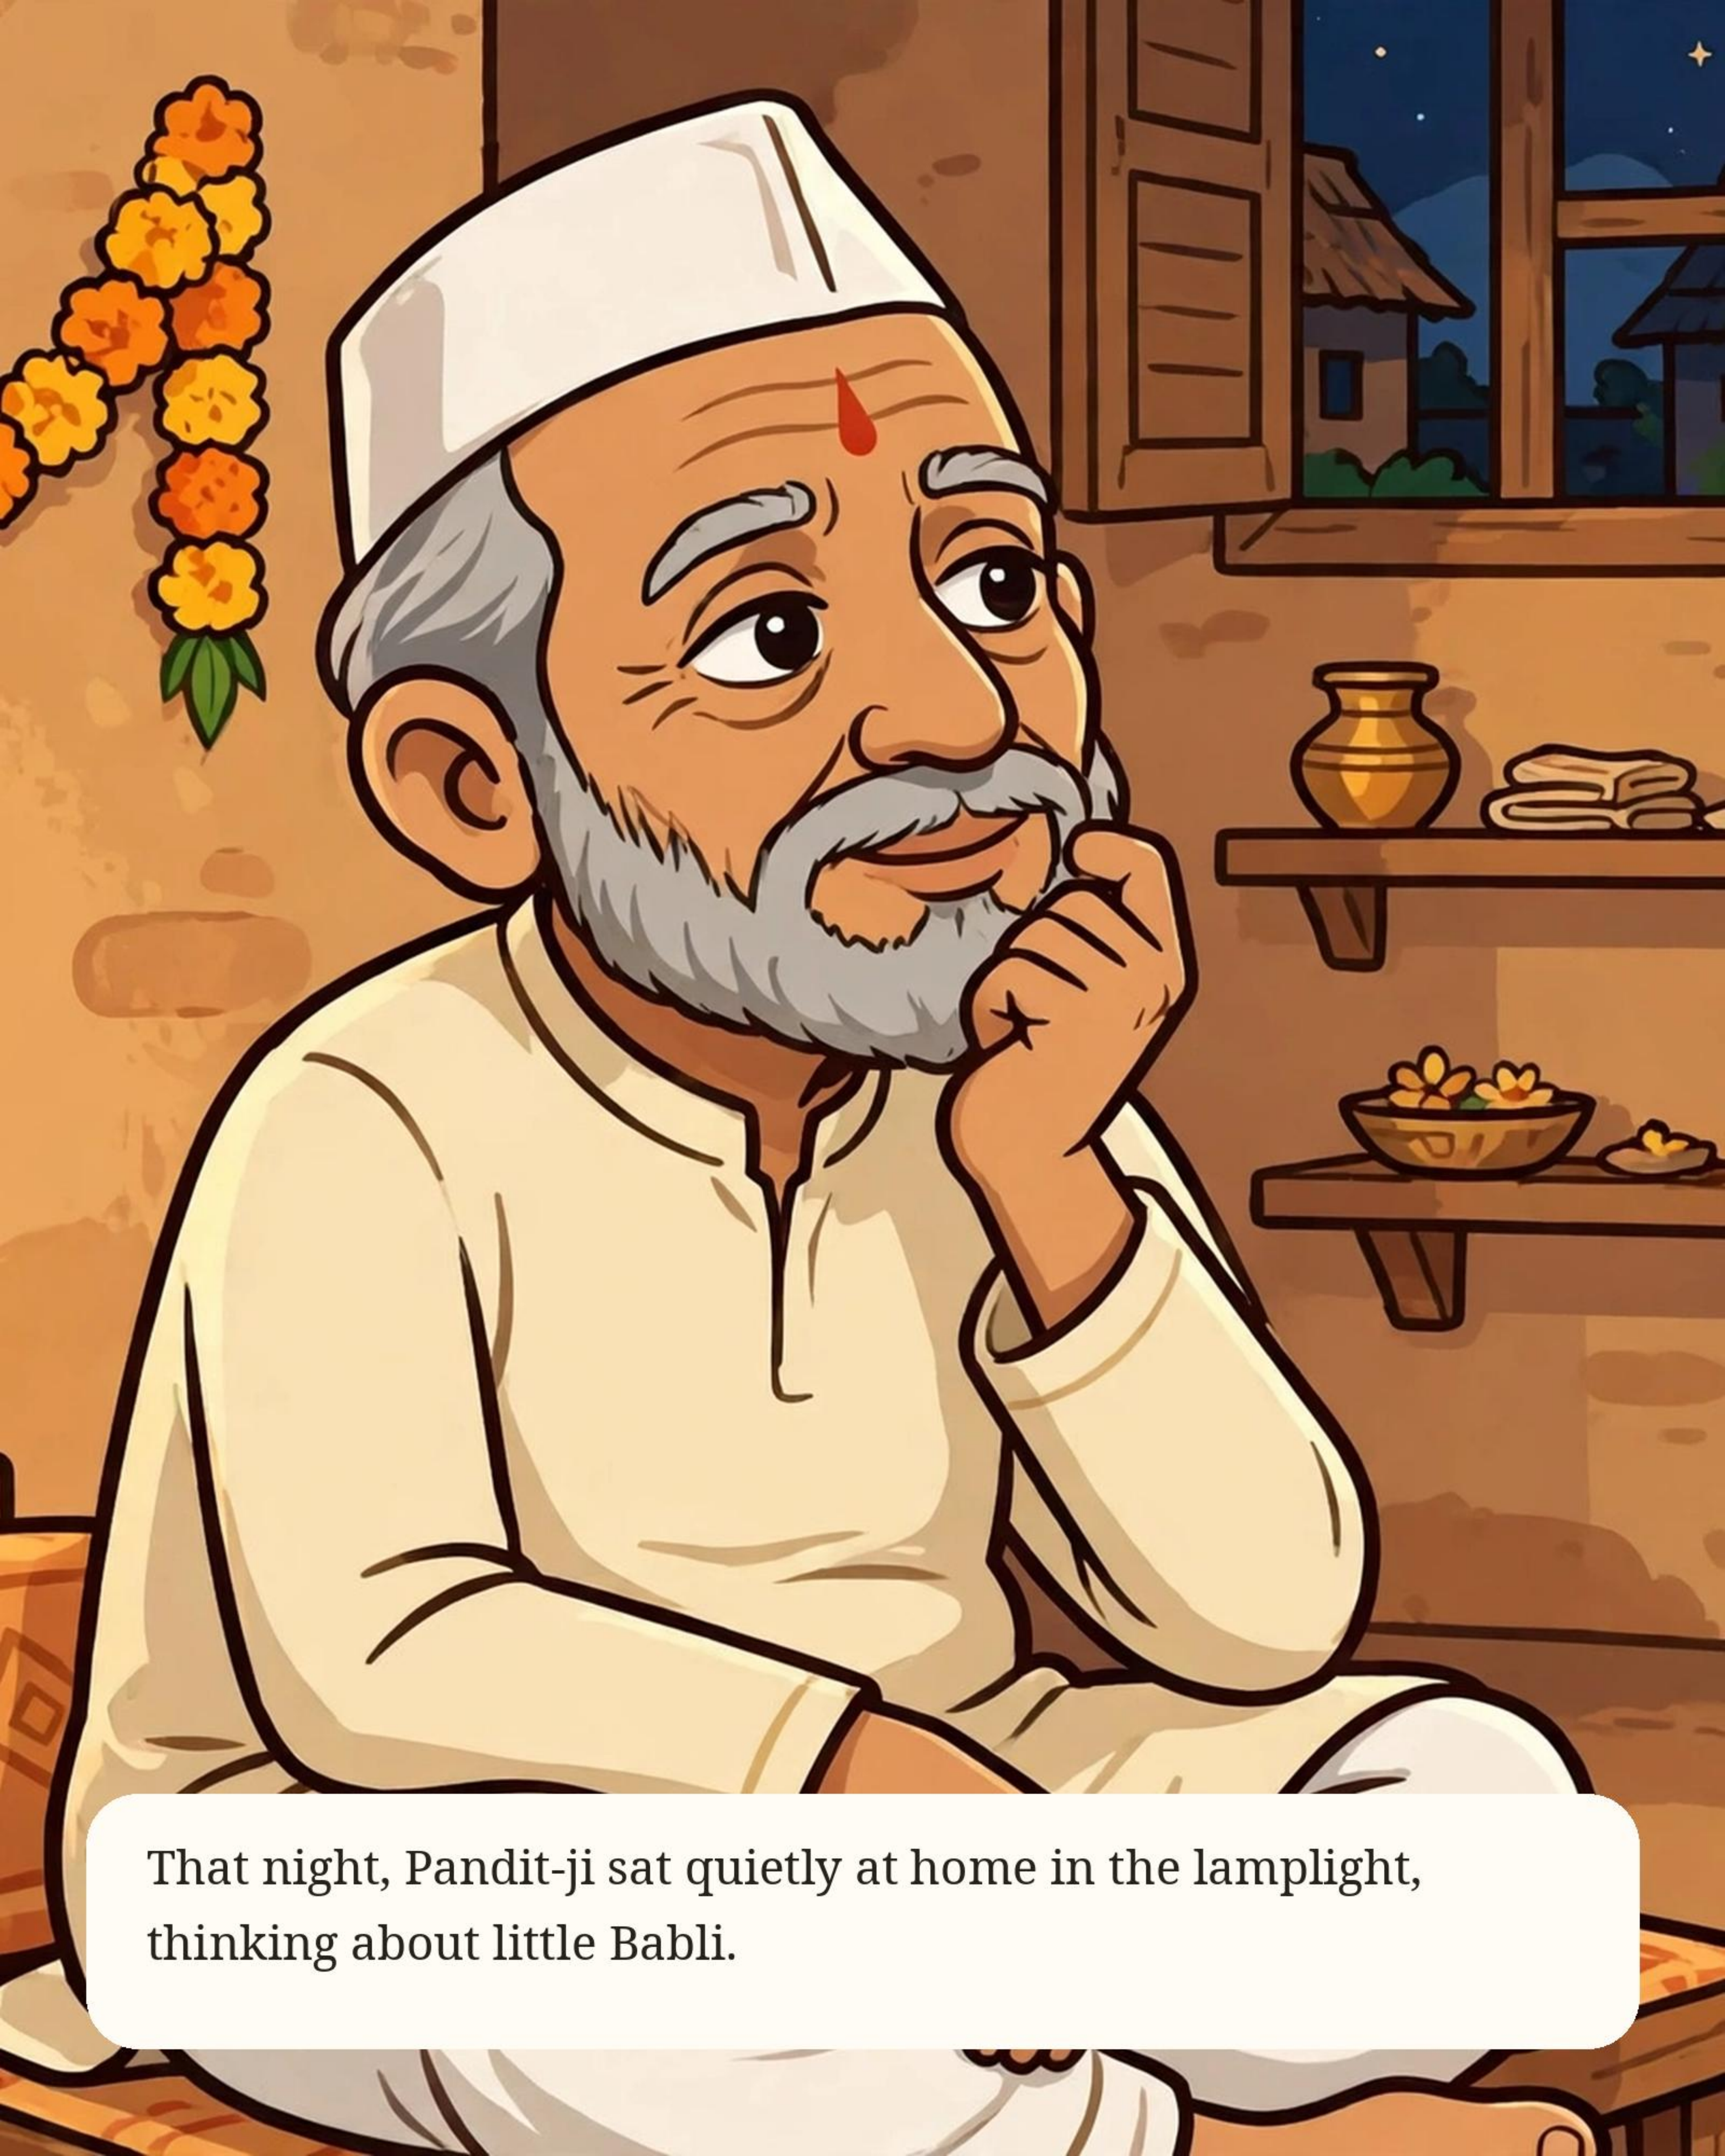

Near the village gate waited a third cheat. "O Pandit-ji!" he cried. "A brahmin must stay pure and clean — and you carry a dog on your shoulder?" Pandit-ji's heart began to thump. Three men could not all be wrong... could they? "Maybe it really is a dog," he whispered.

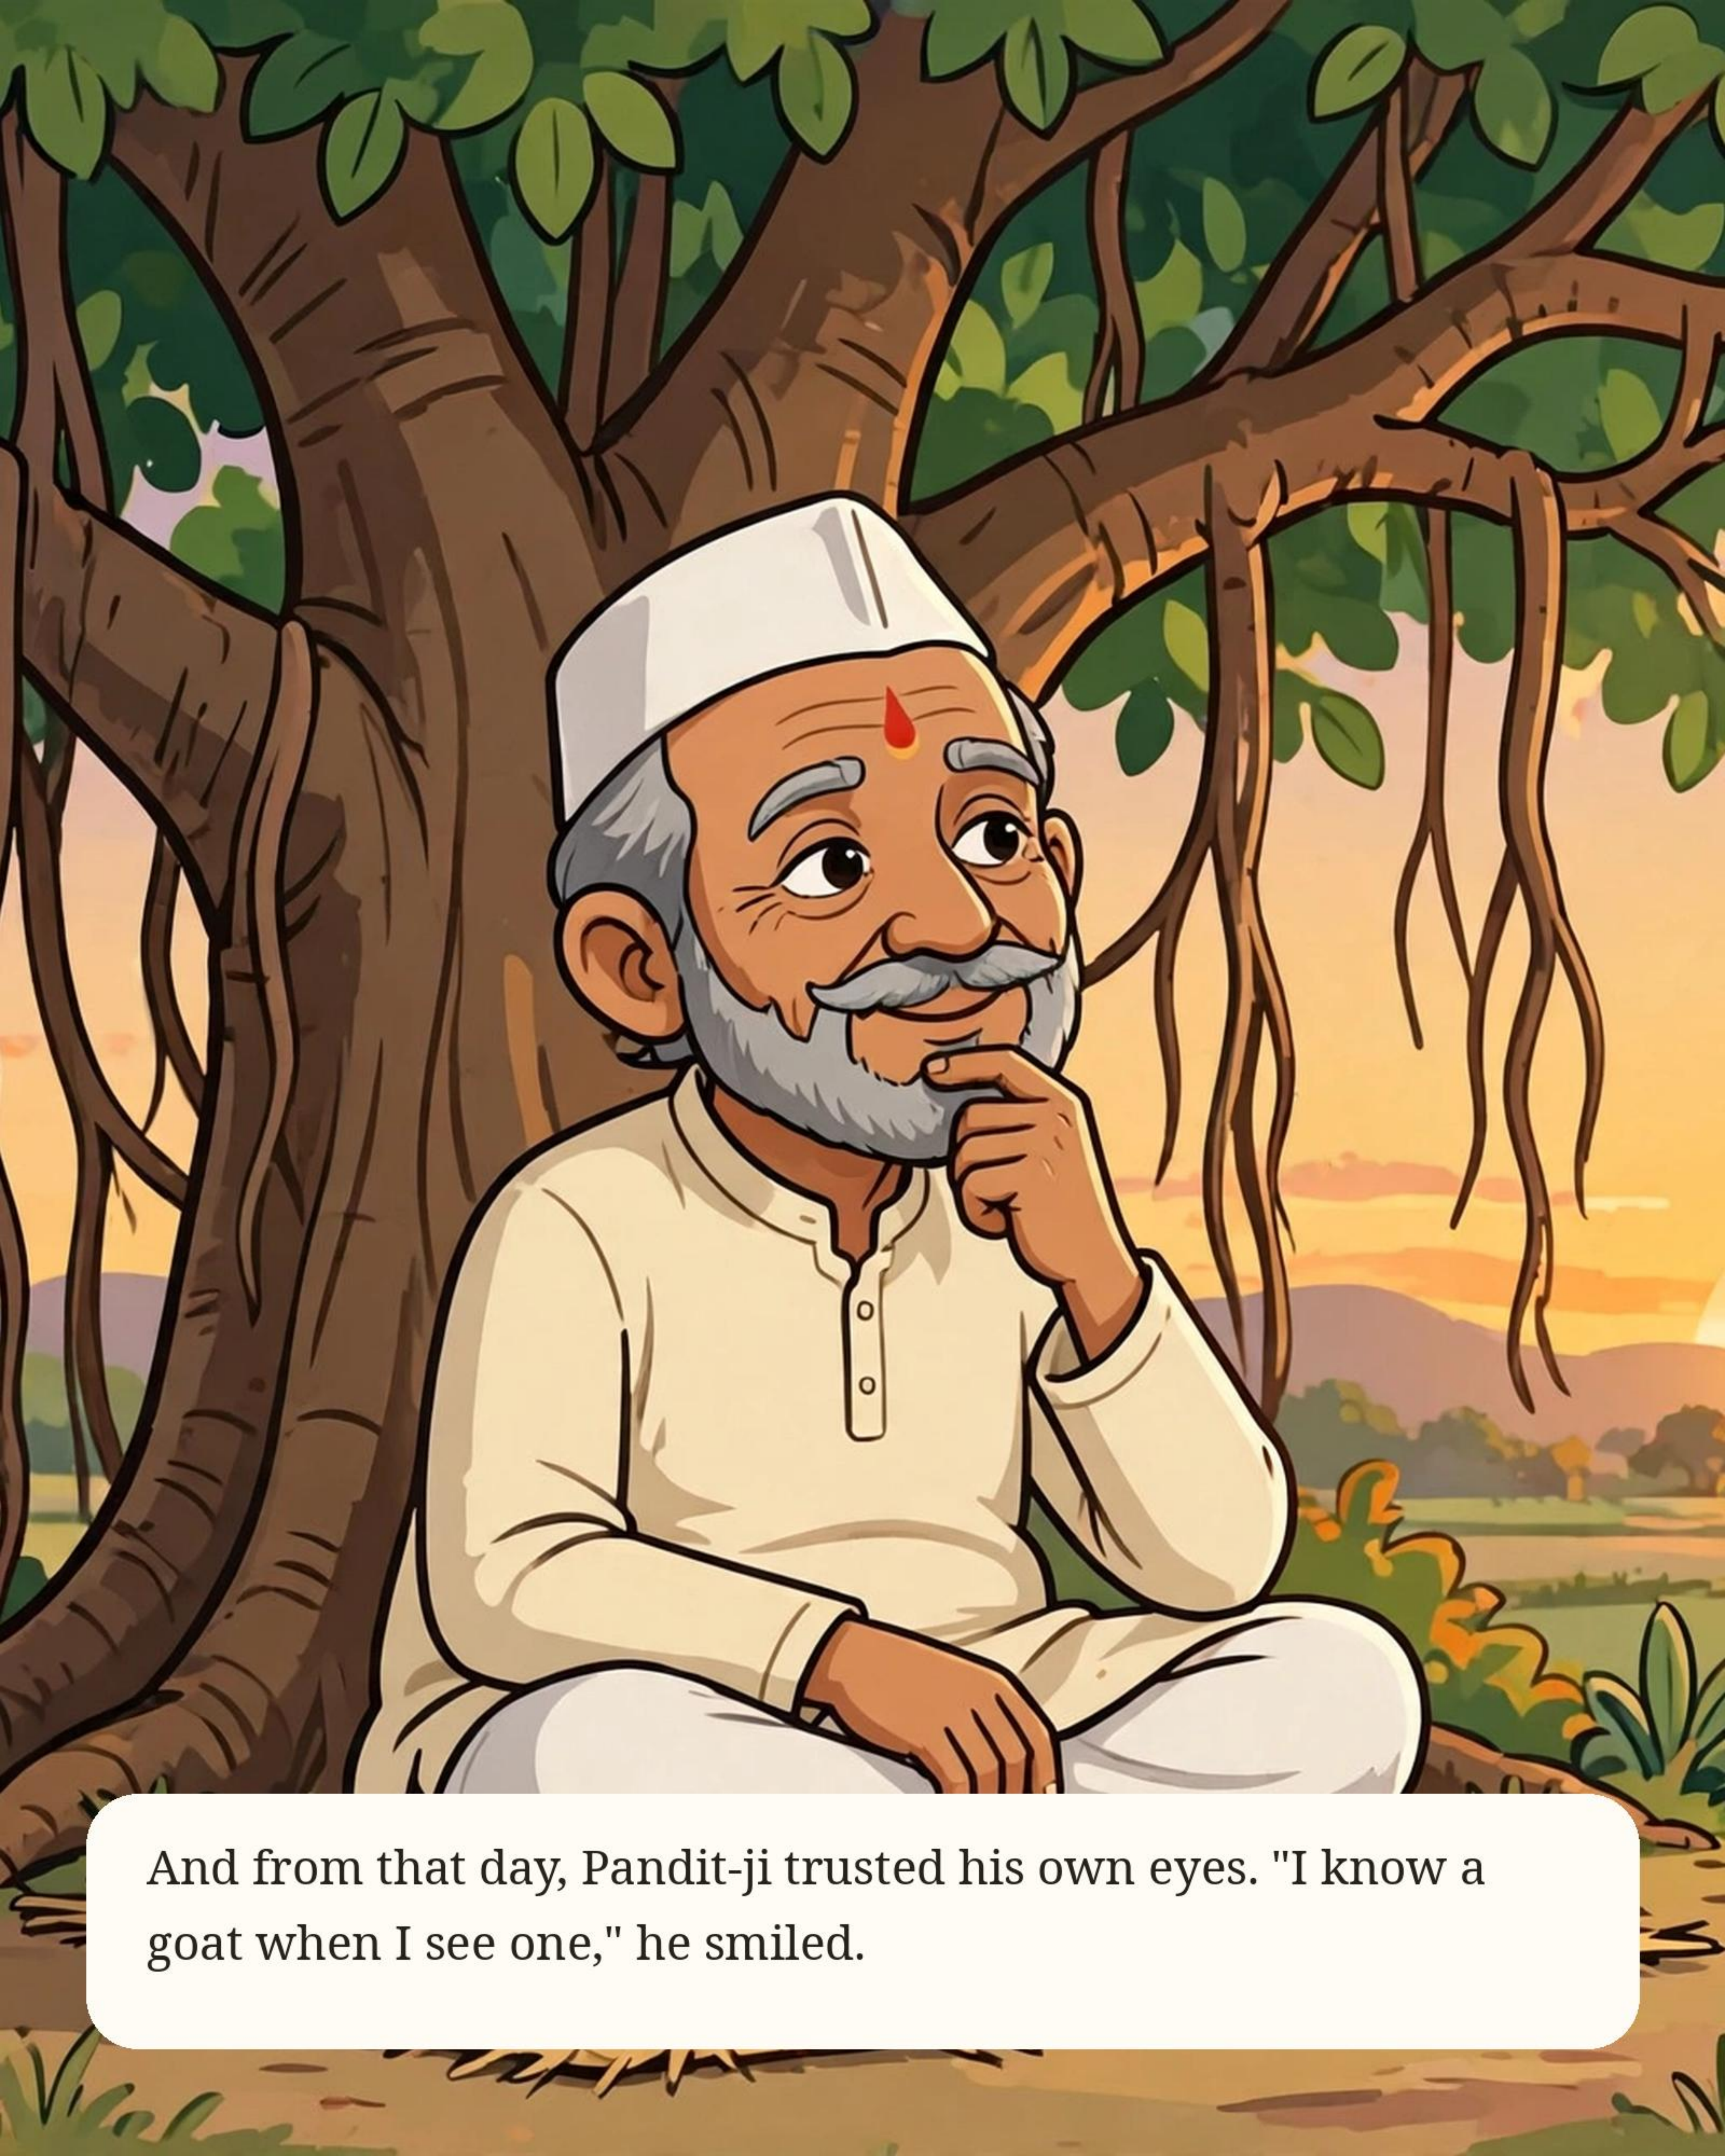

He dropped the goat and ran all the way home, fast as the wind.

Out jumped the three cheats, laughing. They grabbed the poor goat and carried her away.

That night, Pandit-ji sat quietly at home in the lamplight, thinking about little Babli.

And from that day, Pandit-ji trusted his own eyes. "I know a goat when I see one," he smiled.
