The Brave Little Firefly

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

In Willowmere Wood, where the trees tickled the clouds, lived a little firefly named Flick.

Flick had a tiny light on his tail that could glow and glow and glow.

But Flick was afraid of the dark.

"Oh no, oh no," Flick whispered every evening when the sun went to sleep. "It is too dark. Too, too dark!"

So Flick hid under a big leaf and waited for morning.

One night, his friend Mimi the mouse came tapping, tap-tap-tap.

"Flick! Flick!" she squeaked. "I lost my way home. It is so dark, I cannot see my toes!"

Flick peeked out from under his leaf. The forest was dark, dark, dark.

"I am scared too," Flick said in a small voice.

But then he looked at Mimi's worried face, and something warm wiggled inside him.

"Hold my wing," Flick said. "I will try."

Flick took one deep breath — in... and out... — and let his little light GLOW.

First it glowed a little. Then a little more. Then — twinkle, twinkle! — it glowed bright and warm like a tiny lantern.

"Oh!" cried Mimi. "I can see the path! I can see my toes!"

Step by step, glow by glow, Flick lit the way through Firefly Meadow. Past the sleepy flowers. Over the giggly stream. All the way to Mimi's cozy little home.

"Thank you, Flick!" Mimi hugged him tight. "Your light is the bravest light I know."

From that night on, Flick still felt a little scared when the sun went to sleep.

But now he knew a secret: being brave does not mean you are not scared. Being brave means you glow anyway.

And every evening, when the dark came, Flick flew up, up, up — and lit Willowmere Wood with his brave little light.

Twinkle, twinkle. Glow, glow, glow.

Sleep now, little Flick.

Sleep now, little Flick.

The End
