The Little Blue Train

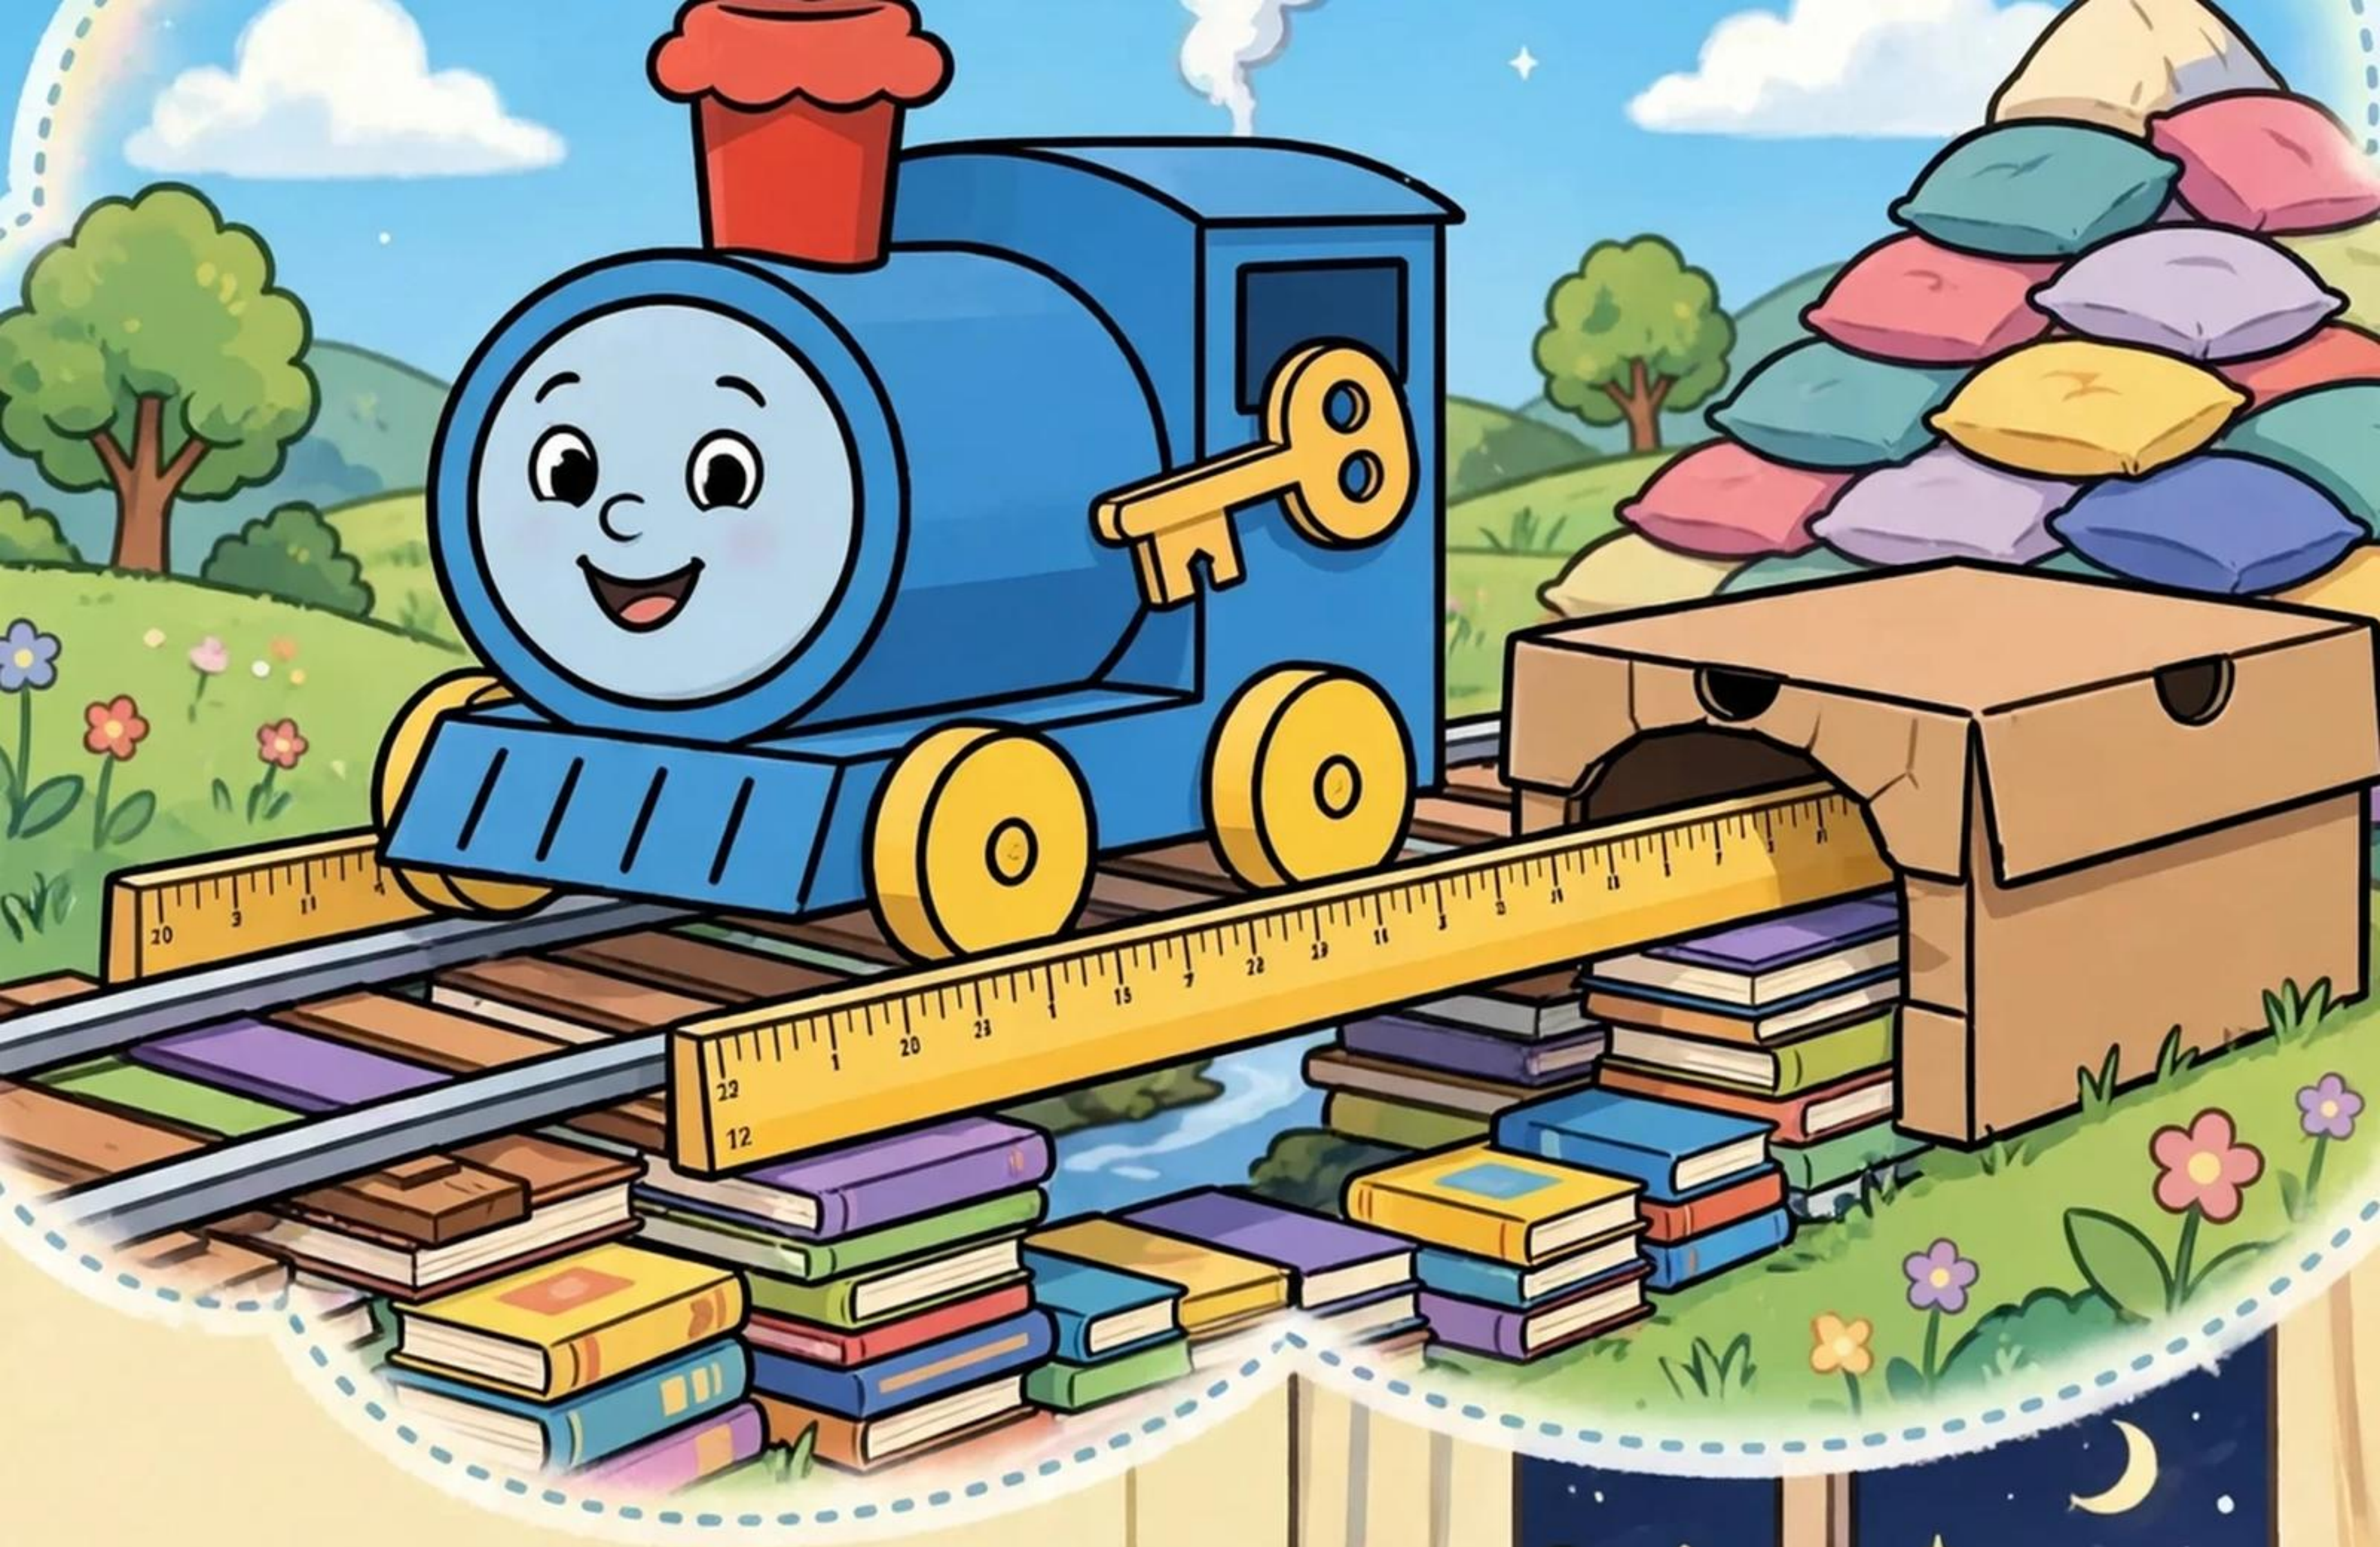

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

In a toy shop window lived a little blue train named Chug. Every day, children pressed their noses to the glass and pointed at him, but nobody ever took him home. As the evenings grew quiet, his whistle drooped — no one wanted the little blue train.

Then one evening, a small girl named Emi walked in. She had saved her coins for weeks and weeks, and now she pointed straight at the window. "That one," she said.

Chug's heart gave a happy jolt. Hopeful at last! Emi carried him all the way home in her pocket, and that night he dreamed the biggest dream of his life — that he was a real train, a great big choo-choo train.

The next morning, Emi wound his key. Click, click, click. Chug rolled across the floor. Choo-choo! he whistled — well, he tried. Toot, toot, toot went his little whistle, three happy toots in a row.

Then Emi built him a railway. Tracks from books. A tunnel from a shoebox. A bridge from a ruler. "All aboard!" she called.

Chug rolled into the tunnel. Dark, dark, dark... then out into the light! He rolled over the bridge — high, high, high — and his little wheels trembled. How brave he felt!

But at the end of the tracks, a cushion mountain blocked the way. "Oh no," cried Emi. "A mountain!"

Chug's whistle wobbled. Then Emi had an idea. She stacked more books, curving the tracks up and over the mountain. Chug chugged upward — slowly, slowly, slowly — until he reached the very top. Then whoosh, down the other side! "We did it!" cheered Emi.

That night, Emi tucked Chug into her toy box. "Best train ever," she whispered. Chug nestled in, cozy and warm. He was not lonely anymore — he had a friend, and tracks and tunnels and mountains all his own.

Outside, a real train whistled far away. Toot, toot. Chug answered softly. Toot — and drifted off dreaming of tunnels and bridges and cushion mountains.

Sleep now, little Chug.

Sleep now, little Chug.

The End
