

Bedtime Tales

The Pajama Parade

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

Daisy the duckling loved her yellow dress and wore it all day long. But when bedtime came, her mother held out her pajamas — blue with tiny stars. "I do not want pajamas," said Daisy, scrunching up her beak grumpily. "I want my yellow dress."

Her mother did not argue. She just smiled a secret smile. "All right," she said. "But the parade starts soon."

"What parade?" asked Daisy, her curiosity waking up.

Just then, she heard music. Toot-toot went a tiny trumpet — it came from under her bed! Daisy peeked under. Her toy elephant was marching out, wearing tiny red pajamas.

"The Pajama Parade is starting!" trumpeted the elephant. Behind him marched her doll in pink polka-dot pajamas, and behind the doll hopped her bunny in green striped pajamas. Daisy giggled. "Where are you going?" she asked.

"To bed, of course!" said the elephant. "Everyone marches in pajamas. It is the rule of the parade."

One by one, her toys marched past, each in the silliest, softest pajamas. Daisy felt left out — she was the only one not in the parade.

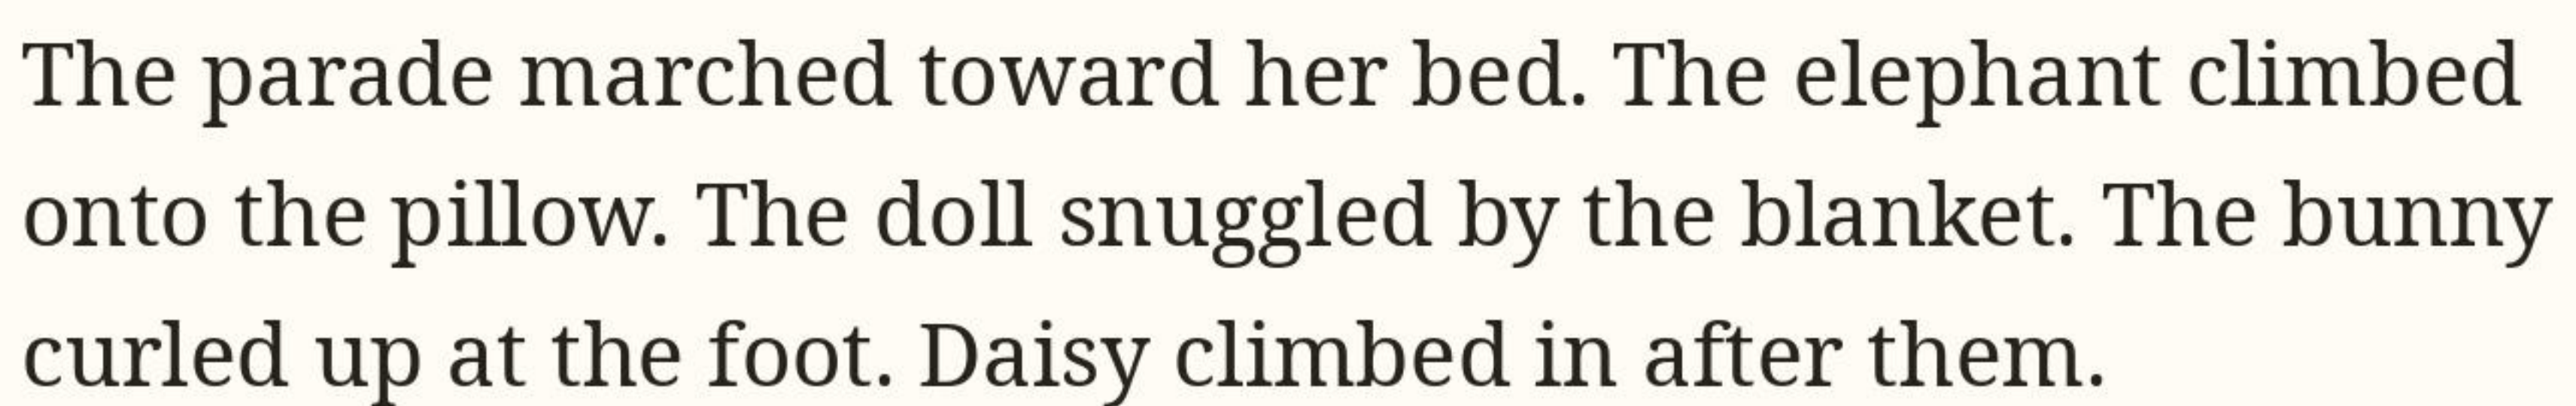

She looked at her blue starry pajamas. They did look rather cozy. She slipped off her yellow dress and pulled the pajamas over her head. They felt soft as a cloud.

"March, march, into bed!" sang the toys.

Daisy joined the end of the line and marched around her bedroom. Left, right, left, right. Her mother clapped along, and Daisy felt happy and proud.

"March, march, into bed!" sang the toys again.

"March, march, into bed!" sang the toys one last time.

Then the parade was over. Everyone was tucked in. Daisy's starry pajamas kept her warm, her toys were quiet now, and her eyes felt heavy.

Sleep now, little Daisy.

Sleep now, little Daisy.
