

Bedtime Tales

The Rain Who Sang

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

Tiana loved rainy mornings. She sat by the window with her chin in her hands, curiosity tickling her like a feather.

The rain tapped on the glass. "Tap, tap, tap," sang the rain.

Tiana tilted her head. "Why do you tap, rain?" she asked.

"Tap, tap, tap," the rain answered.

That only deepened the mystery, so Tiana trotted to her mama.
"Mama, why does the rain tap?"

Mama smiled. "The rain is saying hello to the world," she said.
"It is washing the leaves and waking the flowers."

Tiana liked that idea very much. She pressed her ear to the window, and the rain tapped again. "Tap, tap, tap," said the rain.

This time Tiana tapped back — tap, tap, tap went her fingers — and giggles bubbled up inside her. The rain seemed to tap faster then, as if it were laughing along.

"Can you sing, rain?" Tiana asked. She hummed a soft little tune. Hmm, hmm, hmm. And the rain pattered in time with her hum. Pitter-patter, pitter-patter. Happiness warmed Tiana all the way down to her toes.

She had wanted to play outside, but this was a game too — the listening game. Tiana listened for the loud drops, and the quiet drops, and the drops that went plip, and the drops that went plop.

Then the tapping grew softer. And softer. And softer. The rain was getting sleepy.

"The rain is finishing its song," Mama whispered.

Tiana nodded, her own eyelids growing heavy. The clouds began to open, and a small sunbeam peeked through like a shy smile.

Tiana yawned a big, soft yawn and curled up on the cushions. The last drops went plip, plip, plip. Then everything was still and clean and quiet, and she dreamed of soft, tapping rain falling over Willowmere Wood.

Sleep now, little Tiana.

Sleep now, little Tiana.

The End

