The Whispering Trees

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

Fia the fawn heard whispering outside her window. Shh-shh-shh went the Whispering Pines of Willowmere Wood. It sounded like secrets, and fear prickled down her spine. What were the trees saying?

She hid under her blanket. The whispering continued. Shh-shh-shh. It would not stop. Fia's heart thumped like a little drum.

Her father came in and sat on her bed. "What is wrong, little one?" he asked.

"The trees are whispering," Fia said in a tiny voice. "I think they are talking about me."

Father smiled gently. "Let us listen together," he said. He opened the window a crack, and they both listened.

Shh-shh-shh went the leaves. It was soft and rhythmic. It did not sound angry — it sounded... cozy. Like a story being told.

"Trees whisper, leaves listen, bedtime stories softly glisten,"
Father sang quietly.

Fia listened closer. The whispering had a pattern; it rose and fell like a voice. It really did sound like storytelling! Curiosity chased the fear away.

"Trees whisper, leaves listen, bedtime stories softly glisten,"
Father sang again.

"The Whispering Pines are telling bedtime stories," Fia said, wonder lighting up her face. "To their leaves! The leaves are their babies."

"Exactly," said Father. "Every night, the trees tell stories. About the sun. About the rain. About growing tall and strong."

Fear had melted away, and a deep peace settled over Fia. She imagined the trees tucking their leaves in. She imagined the leaves yawning tiny leaf yawns.

"Trees whisper, leaves listen, bedtime stories softly glisten,"
Father sang one last time.

Fia snuggled into her bed. The Whispering Pines sang her to sleep. Shh-shh-shh. It was the gentlest sound in the world.

Her eyes grew heavy. She dreamed she was a little leaf, and a kind pine told her stories and rocked her in the breeze.

Sleep now, little Fia.

Sleep now, little Fia.

The End
