Tide and the Little Wave

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

Tide was the littlest wave in Bubble Bay, the whole wide ocean of Willowmere Wood. All the big waves rolled in tall and foamy — Crash! — while Tide could only go lap, lap, lap. She felt terribly small.

"When will I be big?" she asked her mama, the sea. "Soon enough, little one," Mama Sea murmured. "For now, just be you."

One morning, a tiny crab was stuck on a rock as the tide went out. "Oh no," cried the crab. "I cannot get back to the water!" His little claws trembled with fear.

Tide heard him, and something brave rose up inside her. She gathered all her littleness together and rolled forward — lap, lap, lap — until she reached the rock. Then she lifted the little crab gently.

"Hold on," she whispered.

She carried him back to the deep water, and Plip! went the crab as he splashed in. "Thank you, little wave!" cheered the crab. "You saved me! You saved me! You saved me!" — three times he said it, clapping his claws.

Tide glowed with pride. She felt big inside, even though she was small outside. From that day on, she was never sad about being little, for little waves could do kind things too. She lapped at the sandy shore, tickled the toes of a giggling child, and rocked a sleepy seashell. Lap, lap, lap.

As the sun went down, the ocean grew calm, and Mama Sea sang a slow, slow song. Hush, little waves, hush. Tide's rolling grew slower, and slower, and slower.

The stars came out and twinkled on the water — twinkle, twinkle, twinkle. Tide yawned a salty yawn and curled into Mama Sea's arms, dreaming of gentle lapping on soft, warm sand.

Sleep now, little Tide.

Sleep now, little Tide.
