

The Spring Flower Parade

An original bedtime story for ages 4–7. Reading time: about 4 minutes.

Kids Book Videos

After the long winter, the garden was brown and quiet.

Little Ami felt worried.

"Will the flowers ever come back?" she asked her grandpa.

"Watch and wait," said Grandpa with a wink.

So Ami watched.

She watched the soil every morning.

One day, she saw a tiny green tip poking up.

"Look!" she cried. "Something is coming!"

She felt excited.

The next day, the tip was taller.

The day after, a bud appeared.

Then one sunny morning, the bud opened.

It was a daffodil, yellow as sunshine.

"Hooray!" cheered Ami. "The first flower!"

She felt proud, as if she had helped.

Then more flowers woke up.

Tulips in red and pink.

Bluebells like tiny bells.

Daisies white as clouds.

"The flowers are having a parade," said Grandpa.

"Look, look, look," whispered Ami.

That was three times she whispered it.

She felt amazed.

Each flower marched out in its brightest colors.

The tulips wore red hats.

The daffodils waved yellow flags.

The bluebells rang without a sound.

Ami danced behind the parade.

She twirled like a petal.

She bowed like a stem in the wind.

A bee buzzed by to join the fun.

Bzzzz, bzzzz, went the bee.

"Hello, bee," said Ami. "Enjoy the parade."

The bee sipped from a tulip and buzzed away happily.

Then Ami had an idea.

She picked one daisy.

Just one.

She tucked it behind her ear.

"Now I am in the parade too," she giggled.

Grandpa smiled.

"You are the prettiest flower of all."

Ami felt warm inside, like sunshine in her chest.

As the sun went down, the flowers closed their petals.

"Time to sleep," said Grandpa.

"Even flowers need rest."

Ami yawned.

She lay in the grass and watched the petals fold.

Fold, fold, fold went the flowers.

Goodnight, daffodils.

Goodnight, tulips.

Goodnight, little white daisies.

Sleep now, little gardener.

Dream of a parade of flowers marching in the sun.

Moral: Beautiful things bloom for those who watch and wait.

The End