

Bedtime Tales

Tara Feels Left Out

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

Tara was a little tiger cub who loved playing with her friends.

One afternoon, the others started a game without calling her name — and ran off without her.

Tara felt left out. Her heart shrank small, and her eyes began to sting. "They do not want me," she thought, sinking down behind the big rock. She wanted to cry.

Mama Tiger found her there. "I see you feel left out," she said softly.

Tara nodded. Tears rolled down her cheeks.

"It is okay to feel left out," Mama said. "That feeling hurts, and it matters."

She wrapped Tara in a warm hug, then said something gentle.

"Feelings want to be told, not hidden."

She said it again, even softer. "Feelings want to be told, not hidden."

And once more, like a lullaby. "Feelings want to be told, not hidden."

Tara wiped her tears and walked to her friends on shaky paws. "I felt left out," she said quietly. "I wanted to play too."

Zed looked surprised. "We did not see you!" he exclaimed.

"We thought you went home. We are sorry, Tara."

They made room in the circle. "Come play!" they cheered.

Tara joined the game, and they played tag until sunset. She ran fast and laughed loud, feeling included and happy right to her whiskers.

That night, Tara told Mama everything. "I told them how I felt," she said proudly. "And they listened!"

Mama smiled. "You were brave with your feelings," she said.

Tara snuggled into her warm den. The left-out feeling of the afternoon had melted into something warm and loved. The jungle sang its night song — hush, hush, little one. Tara closed her eyes.

She belonged. She was loved.

Goodnight, Tara.

When you feel left out, telling someone kindly can open the circle right back up.

The End

