The Ant Picnic

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

On a sunny Saturday, Ayaan had a picnic in the park. He spread his blanket and opened his lunchbox — sandwiches, apples, and cookies. Yum! He felt happy.

Then he saw them — a line of tiny ants marching across the blanket. March, march, march.

Ayaan felt a jolt of surprise. "Oh no, ants!" he cried. He almost brushed them away — but then he looked closer.

The ants were carrying crumbs — crumbs bigger than their heads! "Wow," breathed Ayaan, curiosity bubbling up.

He watched the first ant carry a bread crumb, the second ant carry a cookie crumb, and the third ant carry an apple bit.

"They are having a picnic too!" Ayaan giggled. "Picnic, picnic, picnic!" he chanted. That was three times he chanted it, and he felt delighted.

Ayaan had an idea. He was kind, not scared. He placed three tiny crumbs at the edge of the blanket — one for the bread ant, one for the cookie ant, and one for the apple ant.

"Here you go," he said softly.

The ants found the crumbs and wiggled their antennae — wiggle, wiggle — as if they were saying thank you.

A warm feeling spread through Ayaan. He ate his sandwich while the ants ate their crumbs. Everyone picnicked together.

Then the littlest ant got lost, wandering in circles — round and round. Worry prickled Ayaan.

"Are you lost, little one?" he whispered, and laid a trail of tiny crumbs. The little ant followed the trail — crumb, crumb, crumb — right back to its friends!

Ayaan felt proud. He had helped.

As the sun grew low, Ayaan packed up. "Goodbye, ants," he said. "Goodbye, goodbye, goodbye." That was three times he said it, and a peaceful feeling settled over him.

That night, Ayaan dreamed of marching ants.

Sleep now, little picnicker.

Dream of tiny parades on green grass.

Kindness comes in all sizes — even crumb-sized.

The End
