The First Snowflake

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

Little Avi had never seen snow.

He lived where winter only meant cool breezes — but tonight the air felt extra chilly.

"Mama, will it snow?" he asked, hopeful.

"Maybe," said Mama. "Let's watch together."

Avi sat by the window. He waited... he watched... then he saw it — one tiny white flake floating down.

"One," whispered Avi. "A snowflake!" Amazement fizzed through him.

The snowflake twirled in the air and landed softly on the window ledge. Then came another. And another.

"Snow, snow, snow," Avi whispered. That was three times he whispered it, and he felt his heart go thumpity-thump.

"Each snowflake is different," said Mama. "Look closely. No two are the same."

Avi looked closely. One looked like a star, one looked like a flower, and one looked like a tiny lacy doily.

"Where do they come from, Mama?" Avi asked, curious.

"From clouds high above," said Mama. "The clouds are tucking the earth into a soft white blanket."

Avi liked that. He imagined the whole town under a blanket — the trees under a blanket, the sleepy birds under a blanket, even the grumpy old fence under a blanket.

He yawned.

The snowflakes kept falling, soft and slow. They did not make a sound. Not a tap, not a plip, not a plop. Just soft, soft silence.

Avi's eyes grew heavy. "Can I catch one tomorrow?" he mumbled.

"Tomorrow," Mama promised. She tucked Avi's own blanket up to his chin.

"Snow, snow, snow," Avi whispered once more.

Then his eyes closed.

The moon rose over the rooftops and shone on every sleepy snowflake. Outside, the snowflakes kept dancing down, covering the world in quiet white.

Sleep now, little watcher.

Dream of twirling snowflakes, soft and slow.

Quiet wonders are the sweetest kind to watch.

The End
