

Bedtime Tales

The Paper Boat Voyage

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

On a rainy afternoon, Isha folded a paper boat. She folded it from a page of old newspaper — crease, crease, crease — and her chest puffed up with pride.

"Now you need a voyage," she told the boat. She named the boat Squeak and carried it to the little stream behind her house, which was full from the rain.

"Ready, Captain Squeak?" asked Isha. She set the boat on the water. Squeak bobbed. Then Squeak sailed!

"Go, go, go!" cheered Isha — three times she cheered it — hopping with excitement.

Squeak sailed past a pebble. It sailed under a twig bridge. It sailed around a leaf island. "Ahoy!" called Isha in her captain voice, feeling brave as any sea captain.

Then Squeak got stuck. A fallen branch blocked the stream. Squeak bumped into it. Bump. Isha's tummy tightened with worry.

"Don't worry, Captain," she said. She found a long stick and — gently, gently — nudged the branch aside. Squeak floated free! "Hooray!" cheered Isha, flooded with relief.

Squeak sailed on. It passed a duck feather floating like a sail. It passed a frog sitting on a stone. Ribbit, said the frog, as if to say hello. Isha walked along the bank, following her boat.

Then the stream grew wide and joined the big pond. Squeak floated out onto the open water, bobbing on the little waves. Her heart tugged a little as she watched it drift. "Goodbye, Squeak," she whispered. "Have a big adventure." But her heart was happy too — her boat had sailed so far.

That evening, Isha folded another boat. This one she kept on her shelf. "For tomorrow's voyage," she said. She yawned. The rain tapped softly on her window. Sleep now, little captain. Dream of paper boats on silver streams.

Even little boats, little one, can go on big voyages.

The End

