The Spring Flower Parade

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

After the long winter, the garden lay brown and quiet, and little Ami's heart knotted with worry. "Will the flowers ever come back?" she asked her grandpa.

"Watch and wait," Grandpa said with a wink.

So Ami watched. Every morning she studied the soil — until one day she spotted a tiny green tip poking up. "Look!" she cried. "Something is coming!" Excitement bubbled up in her like spring water.

The next day the tip was taller, and the day after that a bud appeared. Then one sunny morning, the bud opened into a daffodil, yellow as sunshine. "Hooray!" Ami cheered. "The first flower!" Pride warmed her — as if she had helped it grow herself.

Then more flowers woke up: tulips in red and pink, bluebells like tiny bells, daisies white as clouds. "The flowers are having a parade," said Grandpa.

"Look, look, look," Ami whispered — three times, because it felt too wonderful to say just once. Amazement shone from her like sunlight.

Each flower marched out in its brightest colors: the tulips wore red hats, the daffodils waved yellow flags, and the bluebells rang without a sound. Ami danced behind the parade, twirling like a petal and bowing like a stem in the wind.

A bee buzzed by to join the fun. Bzzz, bzzz, went the bee. "Hello, bee," Ami said. "Enjoy the parade." The bee sipped from a tulip and buzzed away happily.

Then Ami had an idea. She picked one daisy — just one — and tucked it behind her ear. "Now I am in the parade too," she giggled.

Grandpa smiled. "You are the prettiest flower of all." Sunshine seemed to fill Ami's chest with warmth.

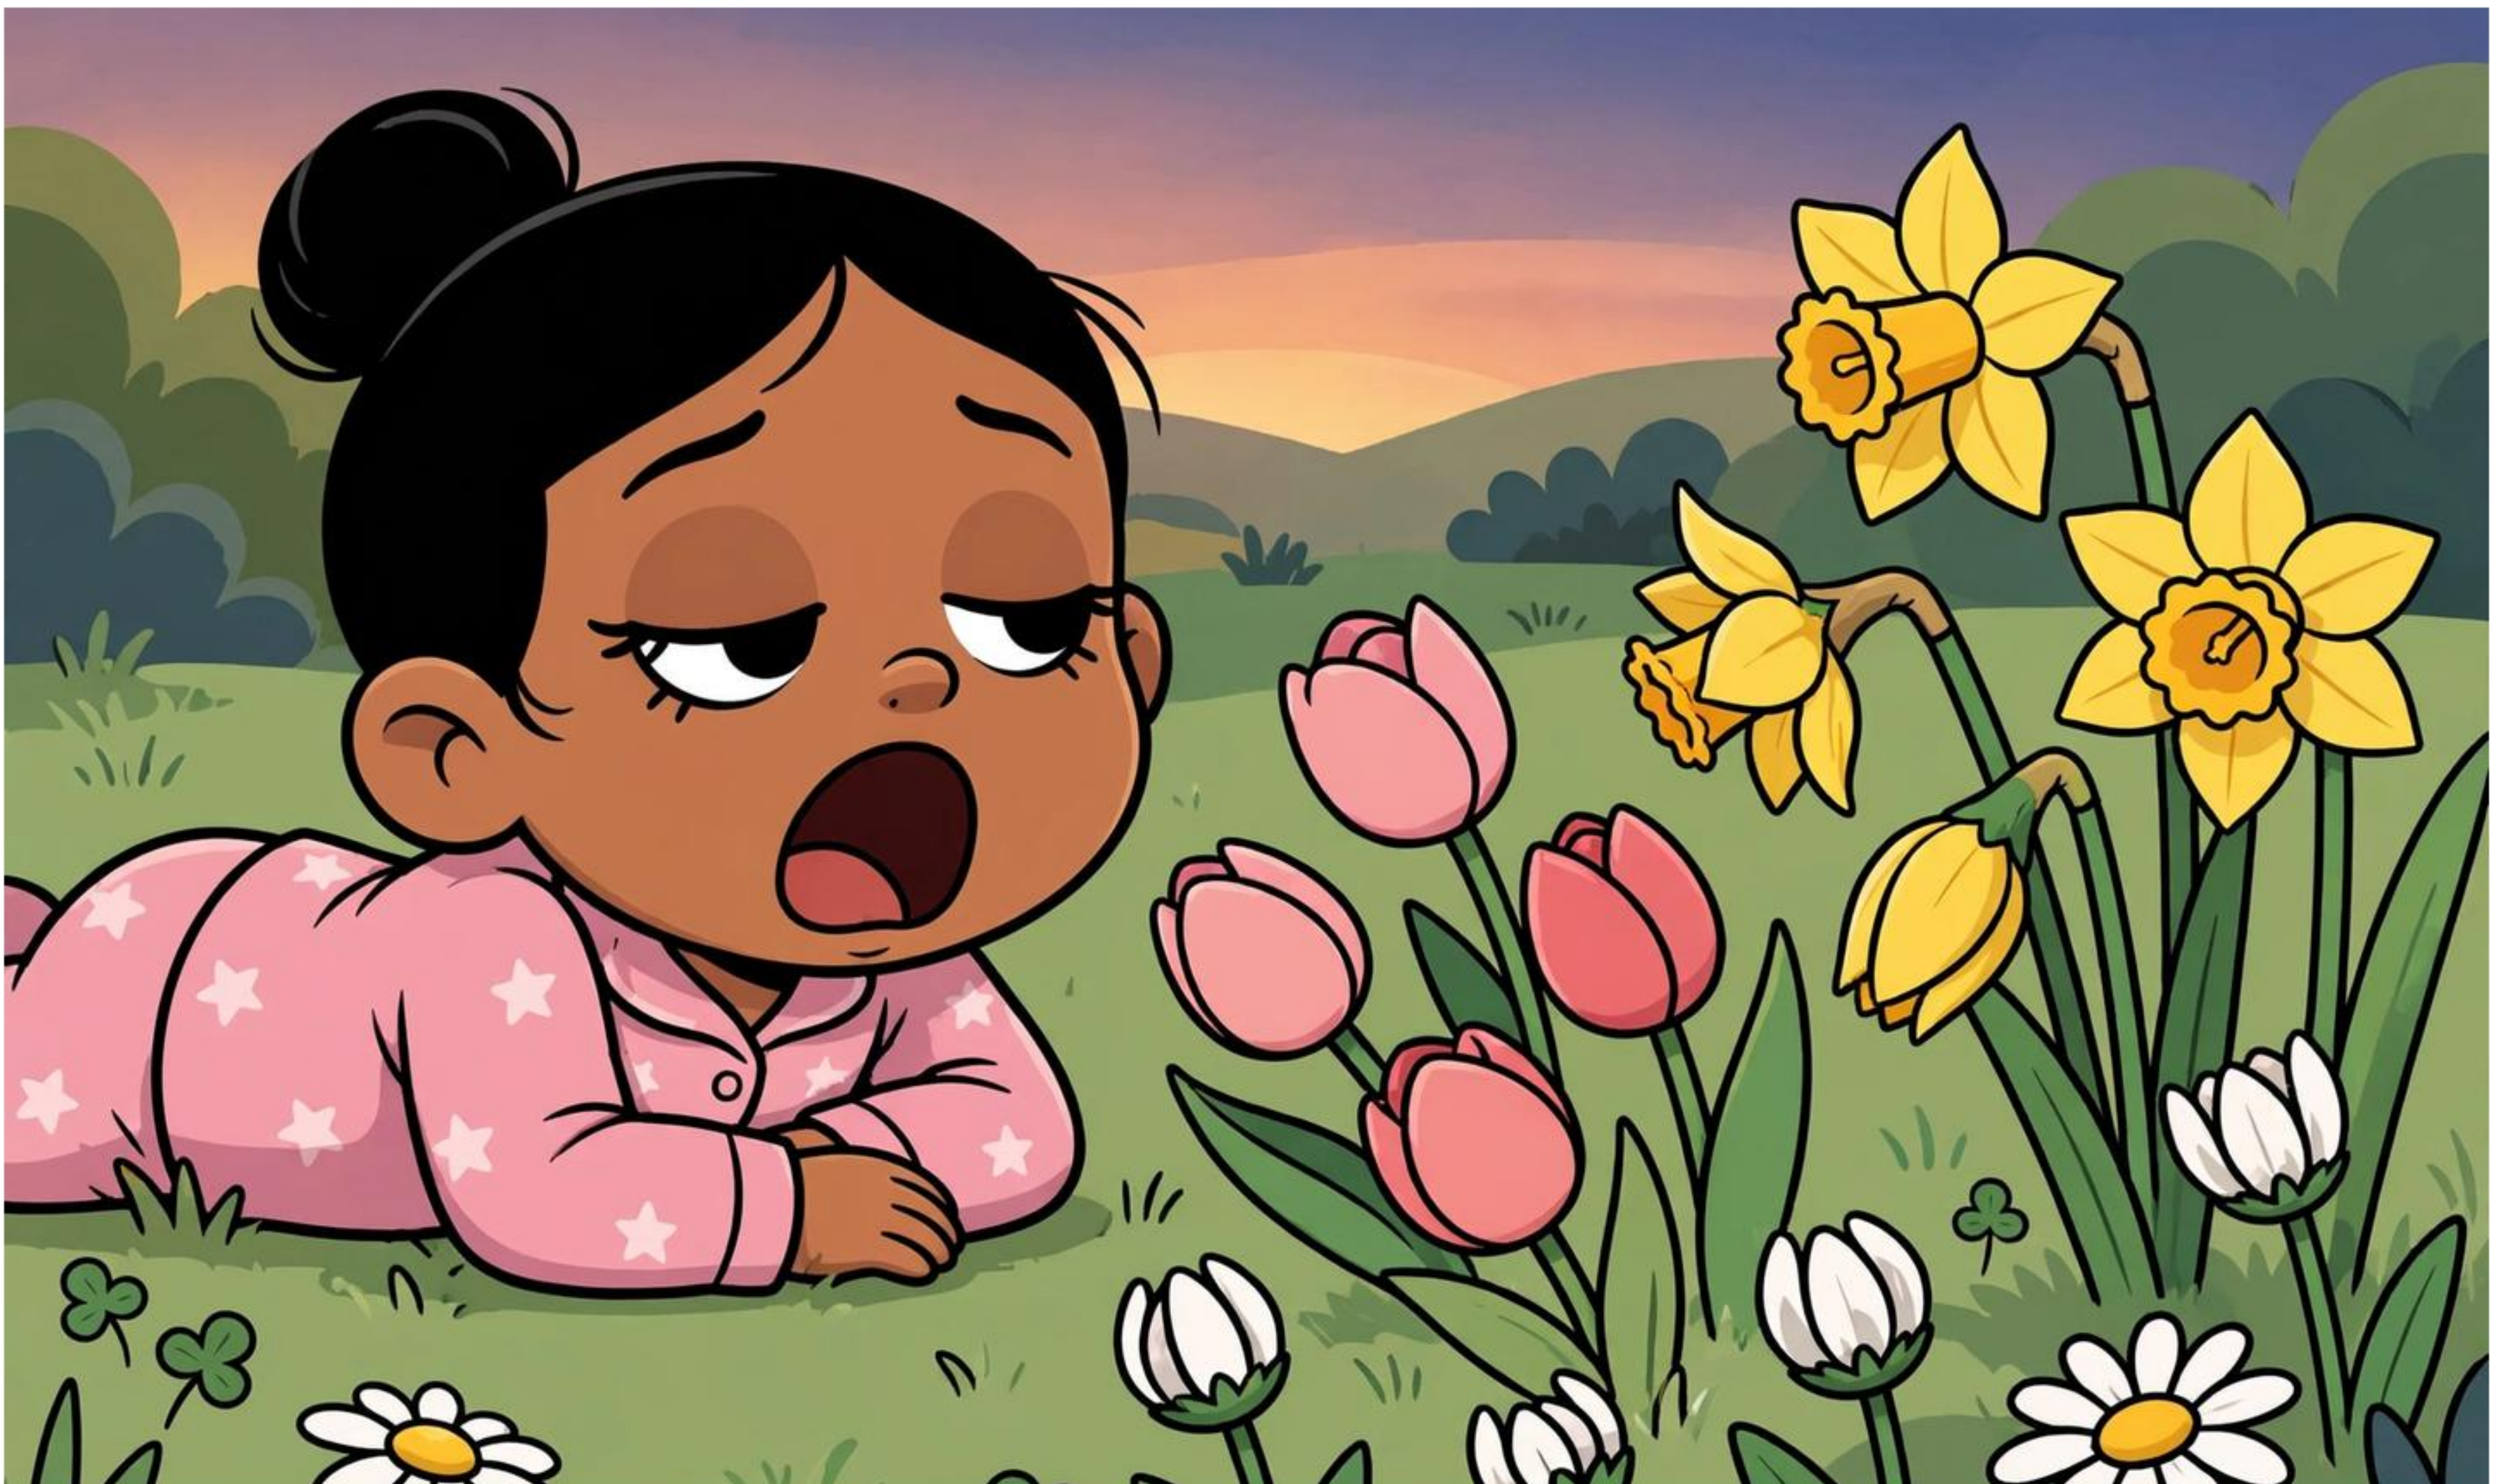

As the sun went down, the flowers closed their petals. "Time to sleep," said Grandpa. "Even flowers need rest."

Ami yawned and lay in the grass, watching the petals fold. Fold, fold, fold went the flowers.

Goodnight, daffodils. Goodnight, tulips. Goodnight, little white daisies.

Sleep now, little gardener. Dream of a parade of flowers marching in the sun.

For those who watch and wait, beautiful things always bloom.

The End
