Why the Sky Blushes

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

Every evening, little Cara watched the sky turn pink, her eyes full of wonder. "Mama, why does the sky blush?" she asked. "Blush?" laughed Mama. "Yes," said Cara. "It turns pink like cheeks." Mama smiled. "Let me tell you the sky's secret."

Long ago, the sky was always blue — blue in the morning, blue at noon, blue at night — and the sky grew bored. "I want to wear other colors," the sky sighed. So the sun offered to help. "When I go to sleep," said the sun, "I will paint you." And every evening, as the sun sank low, it painted the sky — first pink, then orange, then purple. "Pretty, pretty, pretty," whispered the sky — three times it whispered it — and the sky felt delighted.

Cara loved this story, but she had another question. "Why does it blush only at bedtime?" she asked. "Because the sun is saying goodnight," said Mama. "It paints the sky so we know it is time to rest."

That evening Cara watched the sky. The sun dipped lower, and the clouds turned pink at the edges, then peachy, then soft purple. Cara felt calm all over. The whole world seemed to slow down — the birds flew home, the flowers closed up, and the shadows grew long and soft.

"Goodnight, sun," whispered Cara. "Goodnight, goodnight, goodnight," she whispered — three times again. She felt sleepy.

The pink faded to lavender, and the lavender faded to deep blue. One by one, the stars popped out. Twinkle, twinkle, little stars.

Mama tucked Cara into bed. "Did the sky blush tonight?" asked Cara, yawning. "The prettiest blush yet," said Mama.

Cara closed her eyes and dreamed of a sky painted pink and gold.

Sleep now, little watcher. Dream of sunsets that blush just for you.
