Chiku was a little chipmunk.

He had a pile of shiny acorns.

Ten acorns.

He counted them every day.

One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten.

They were all his.

One chilly morning, his friend Gigi the squirrel came by.

Gigi looked hungry.

"I lost my acorns," Gigi said softly.

"My store is empty."

Chiku felt unsure.

His tummy felt tight.

He loved his acorns.

He did not want to share.

Mama Chipmunk saw his face.

She said, "I see you feel unsure about sharing."

Chiku nodded.

"It is okay to feel unsure," Mama said.

"Sharing is hard at first."

Then Mama said something kind.

"Shared joy grows, kept joy just sits."

"Shared joy grows, kept joy just sits," she said again.

"Shared joy grows, kept joy just sits," she said one more time.

Chiku looked at his ten acorns.

He looked at hungry Gigi.

He picked up one acorn.

Then another.

Then one more.

"Here," he said. "Three for you."

Gigi's eyes went wide.

"Thank you, Chiku!" she said.

They cracked the acorns together.

Crunch, crunch, crunch.

They tasted extra yummy.

Chiku felt something warm in his chest.

It was a happy, glowy feeling.

Sharing felt good.

Better than counting alone.

That afternoon, they played together.

They raced around the oak tree.

They laughed and laughed.

Chiku still had seven acorns.
But he had something better.
A happy friend.

That night, Chiku snuggled into his warm nest.
He thought about Gigi's smile.
He felt the glowy feeling again.
He was kind.
He was loved.
The moon peeked through the leaves.
Chiku closed his eyes.
Goodnight, Chiku.

Moral: Sharing turns one person's joy into two people's joy.
