Nasruddin and the Magic Pot

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

In a sunny village long ago lived a clever, funny man named Nasruddin. Everyone loved his jokes — and his lessons.

One day Nasruddin knocked on his neighbor's door. "May I borrow your big cooking pot?" he asked. "I am making soup for my whole family."

The neighbor was a grumpy, greedy man, but he lent the pot.
"Bring it back clean!" he growled.

The next day, Nasruddin returned the pot — and inside it sat a tiny little pot!

"What is this?" asked the neighbor, frowning.

"Good news!" said Nasruddin. "Your pot had a baby while it stayed with me. The baby is yours, of course."

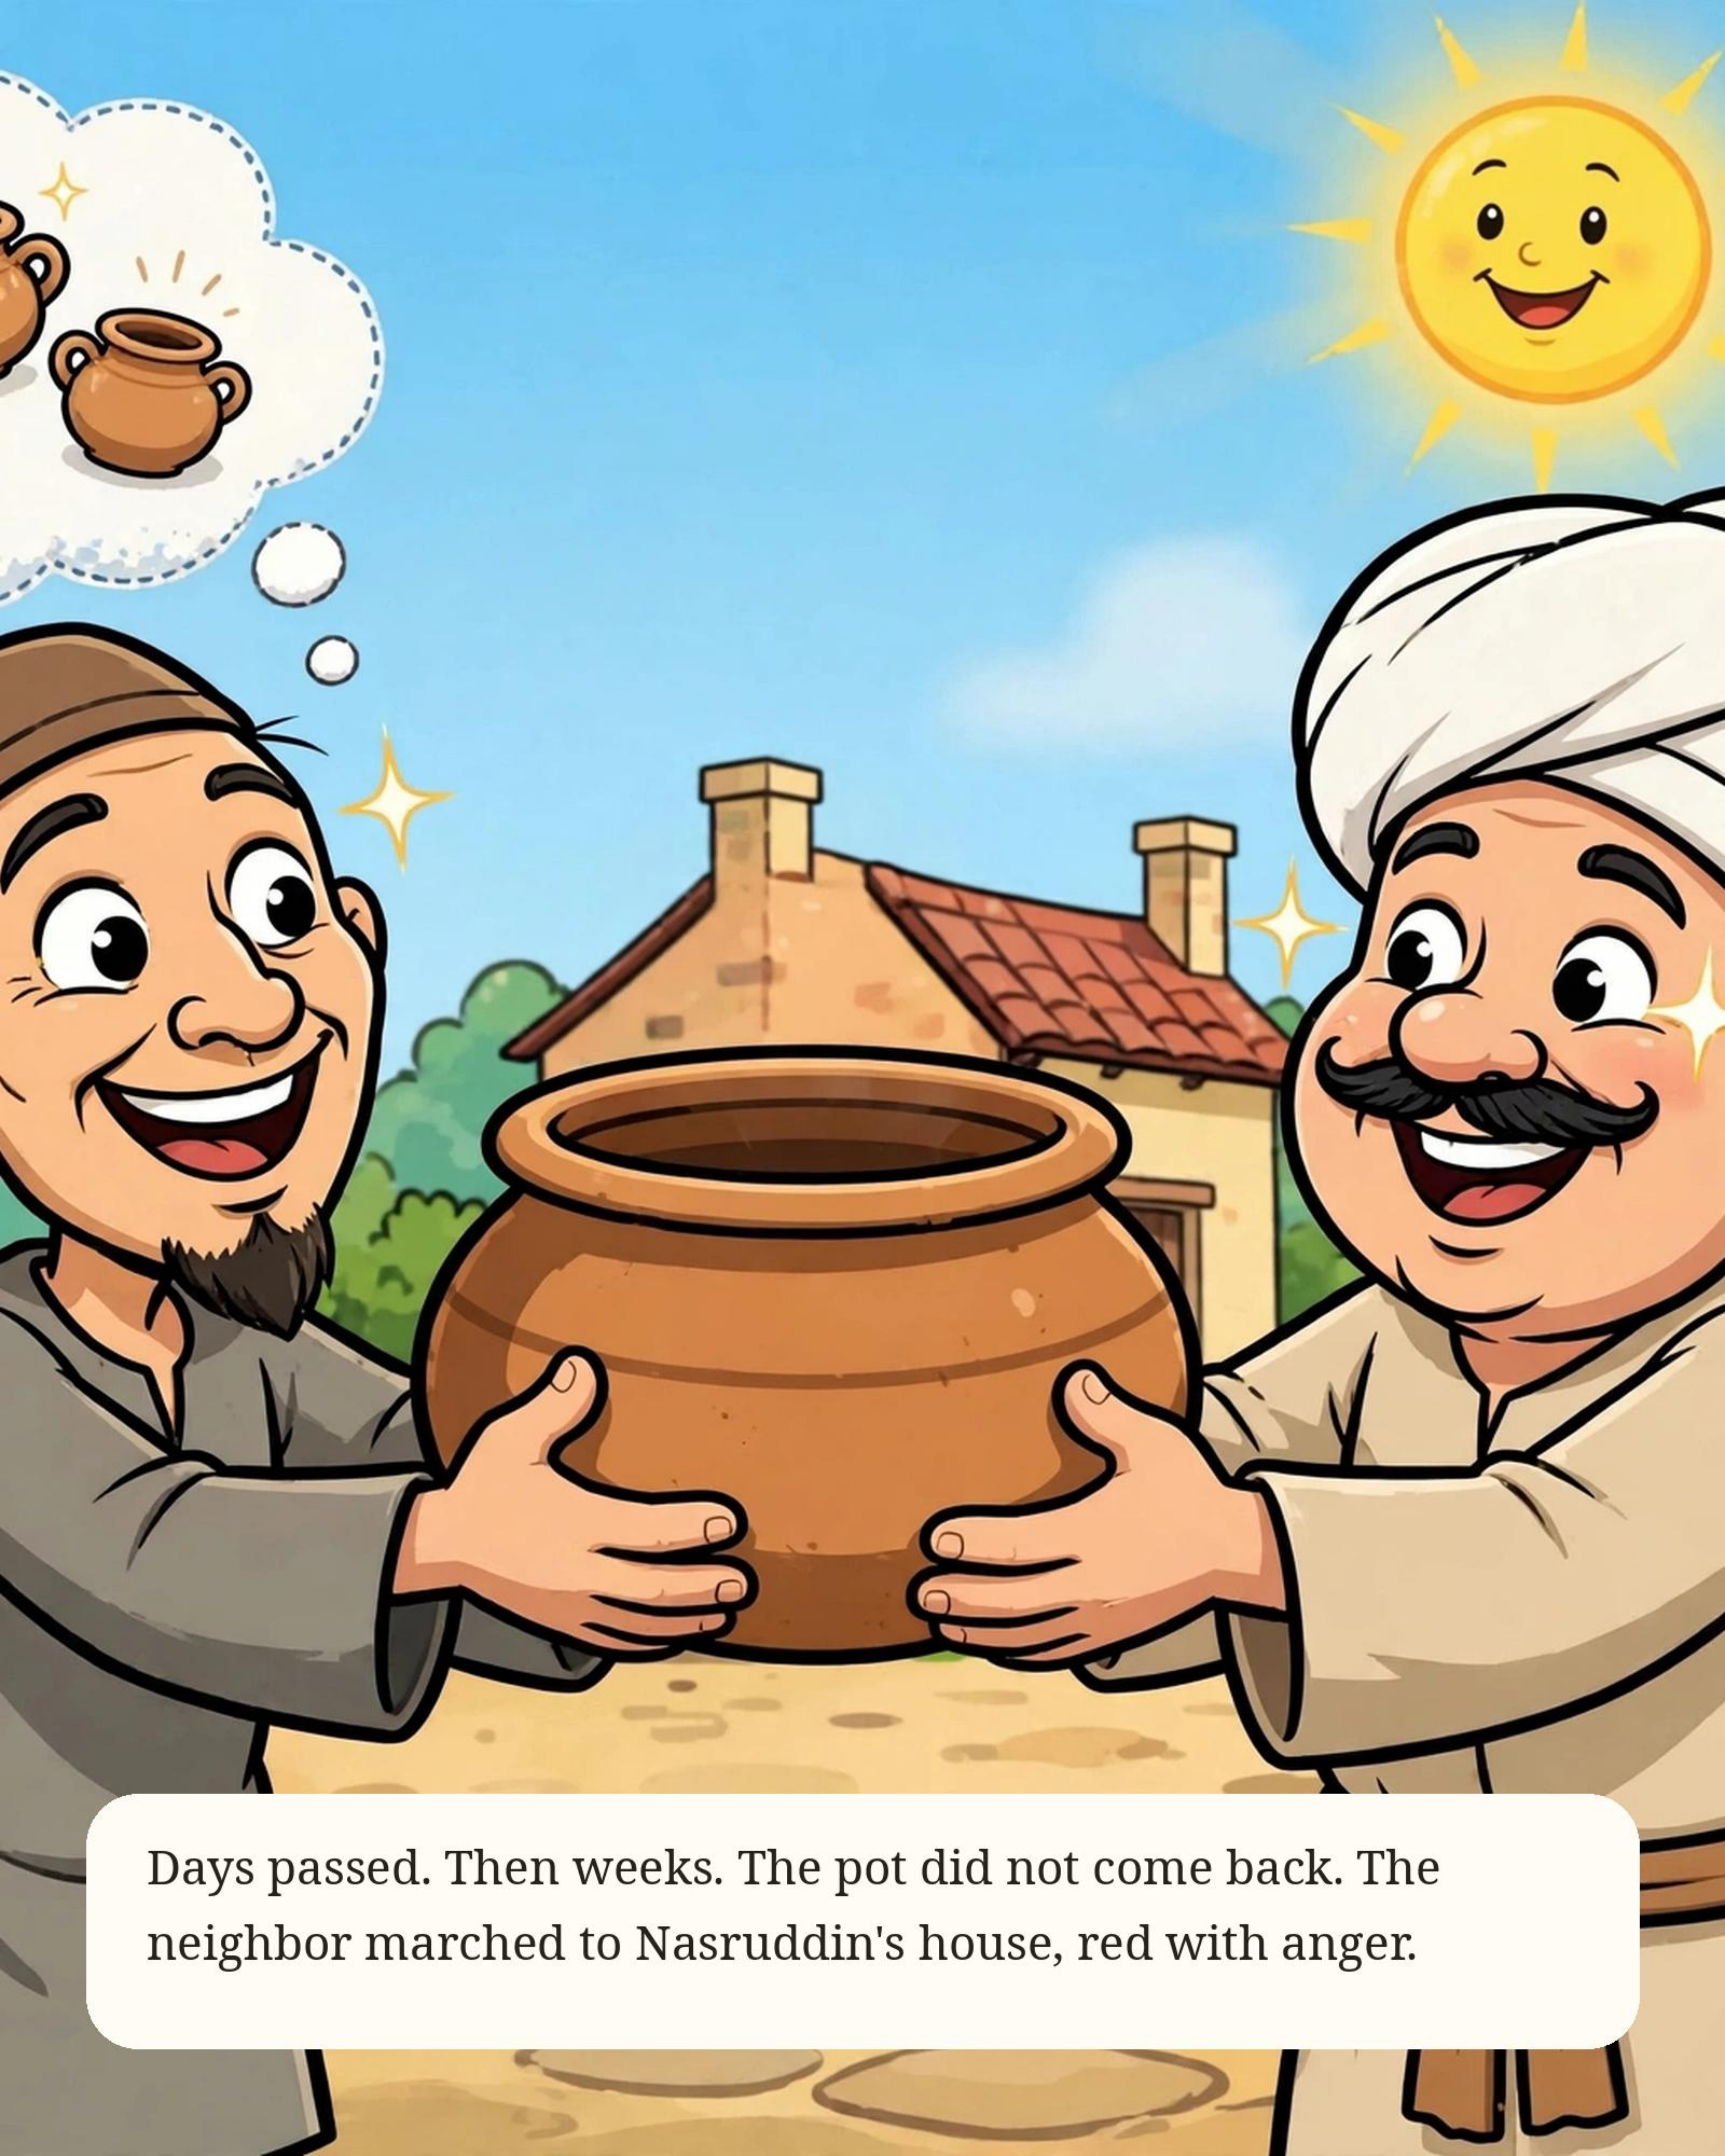

The neighbor's eyes grew wide with greed. A magic pot that has babies! He grabbed both pots and ran inside, giggling.

A week later, Nasruddin came knocking again. "May I borrow your big pot once more?"

"Yes, yes! Take it!" said the neighbor, dreaming of more baby pots.

Days passed. Then weeks. The pot did not come back. The neighbor marched to Nasruddin's house, red with anger.

"Where is my pot?" he shouted.

Nasruddin wiped a tear. "Sad news, my friend. Your pot has died."

"Pots don't die!" yelled the neighbor. "But pots can have babies?" asked Nasruddin calmly. "If you believed the happy magic, you must believe the sad ending too."

The neighbor had no answer. He walked home quietly, and from that day, he never let greed do his thinking for him.

Greed makes fools of us all — think before you grab.
