The Doves and the Net

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

High above the green fields flew a flock of soft grey doves, light as little clouds. Their leader was Kabbu, the wisest dove of all, with a tiny blue feather tucked behind his ear like a crown.

One bright morning, they spotted golden grains scattered on the ground below. "Breakfast!" cooed the doves, their tummies rumbling.

"Wait," said Kabbu, holding up his wing. "Grains lying in the open may be a hunter's trap. Let us be careful."

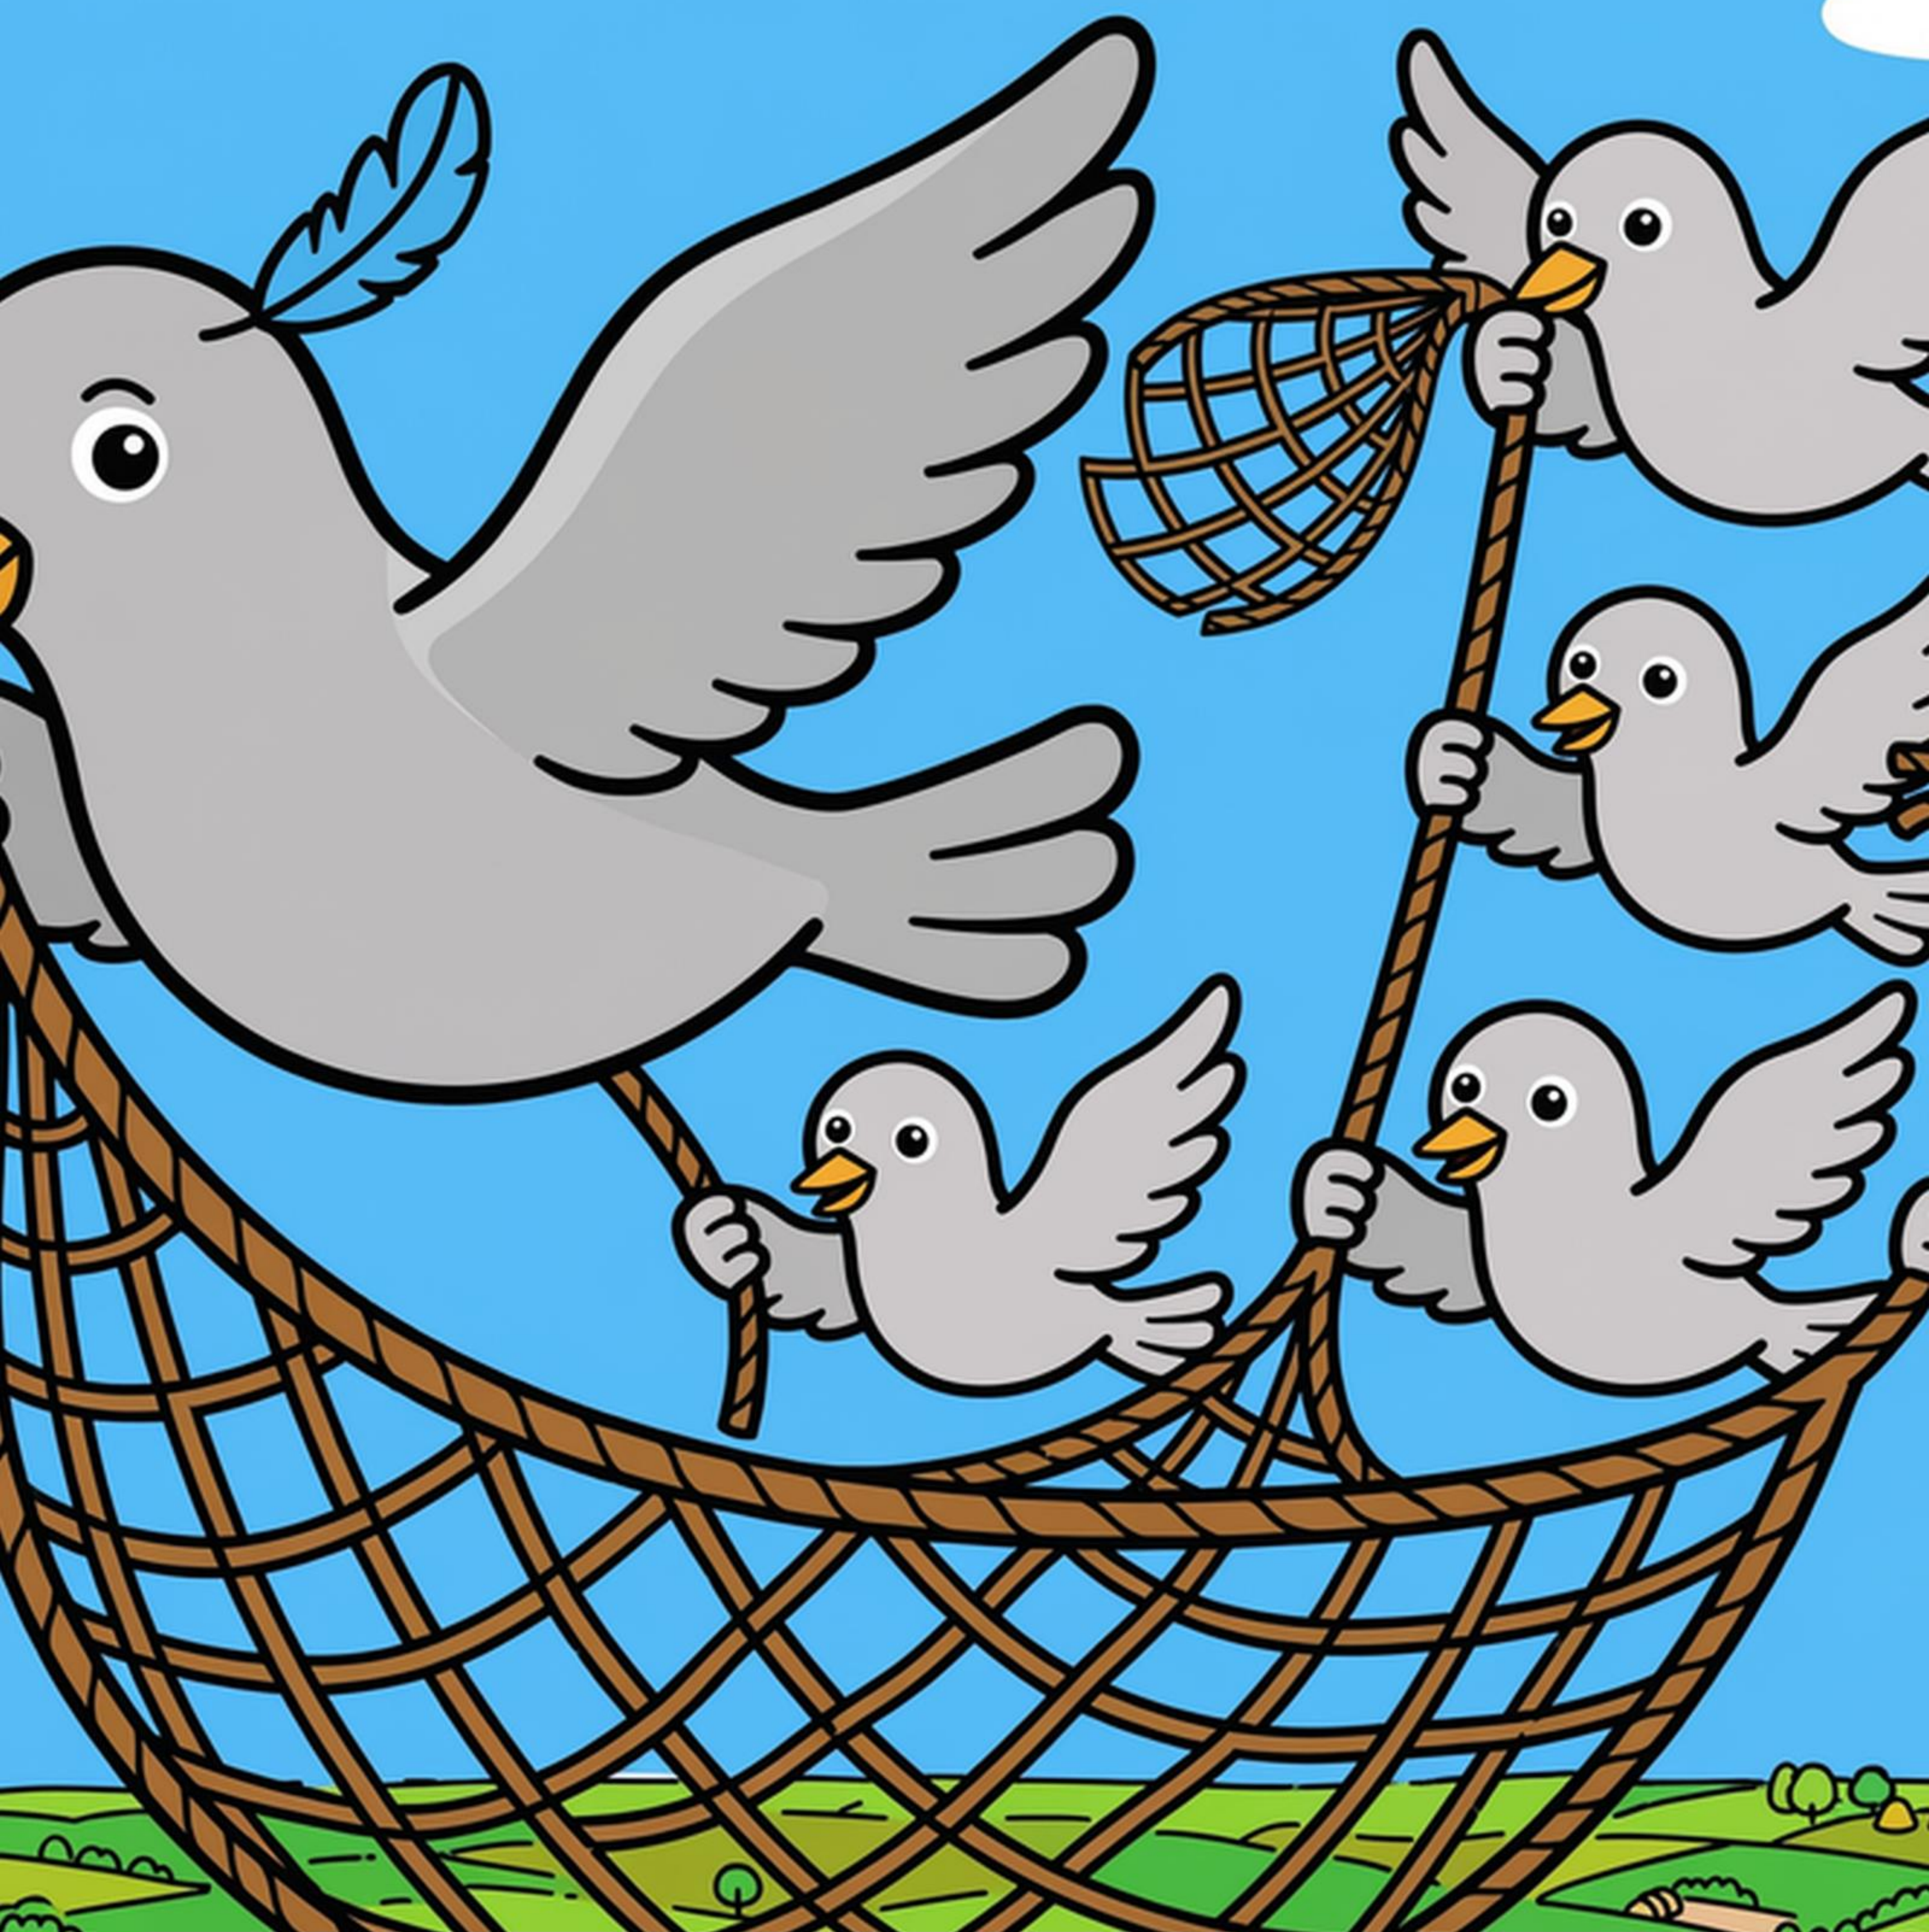

But the doves were so hungry. Down they swooped — peck, peck, peck! — and gobbled up the grains.

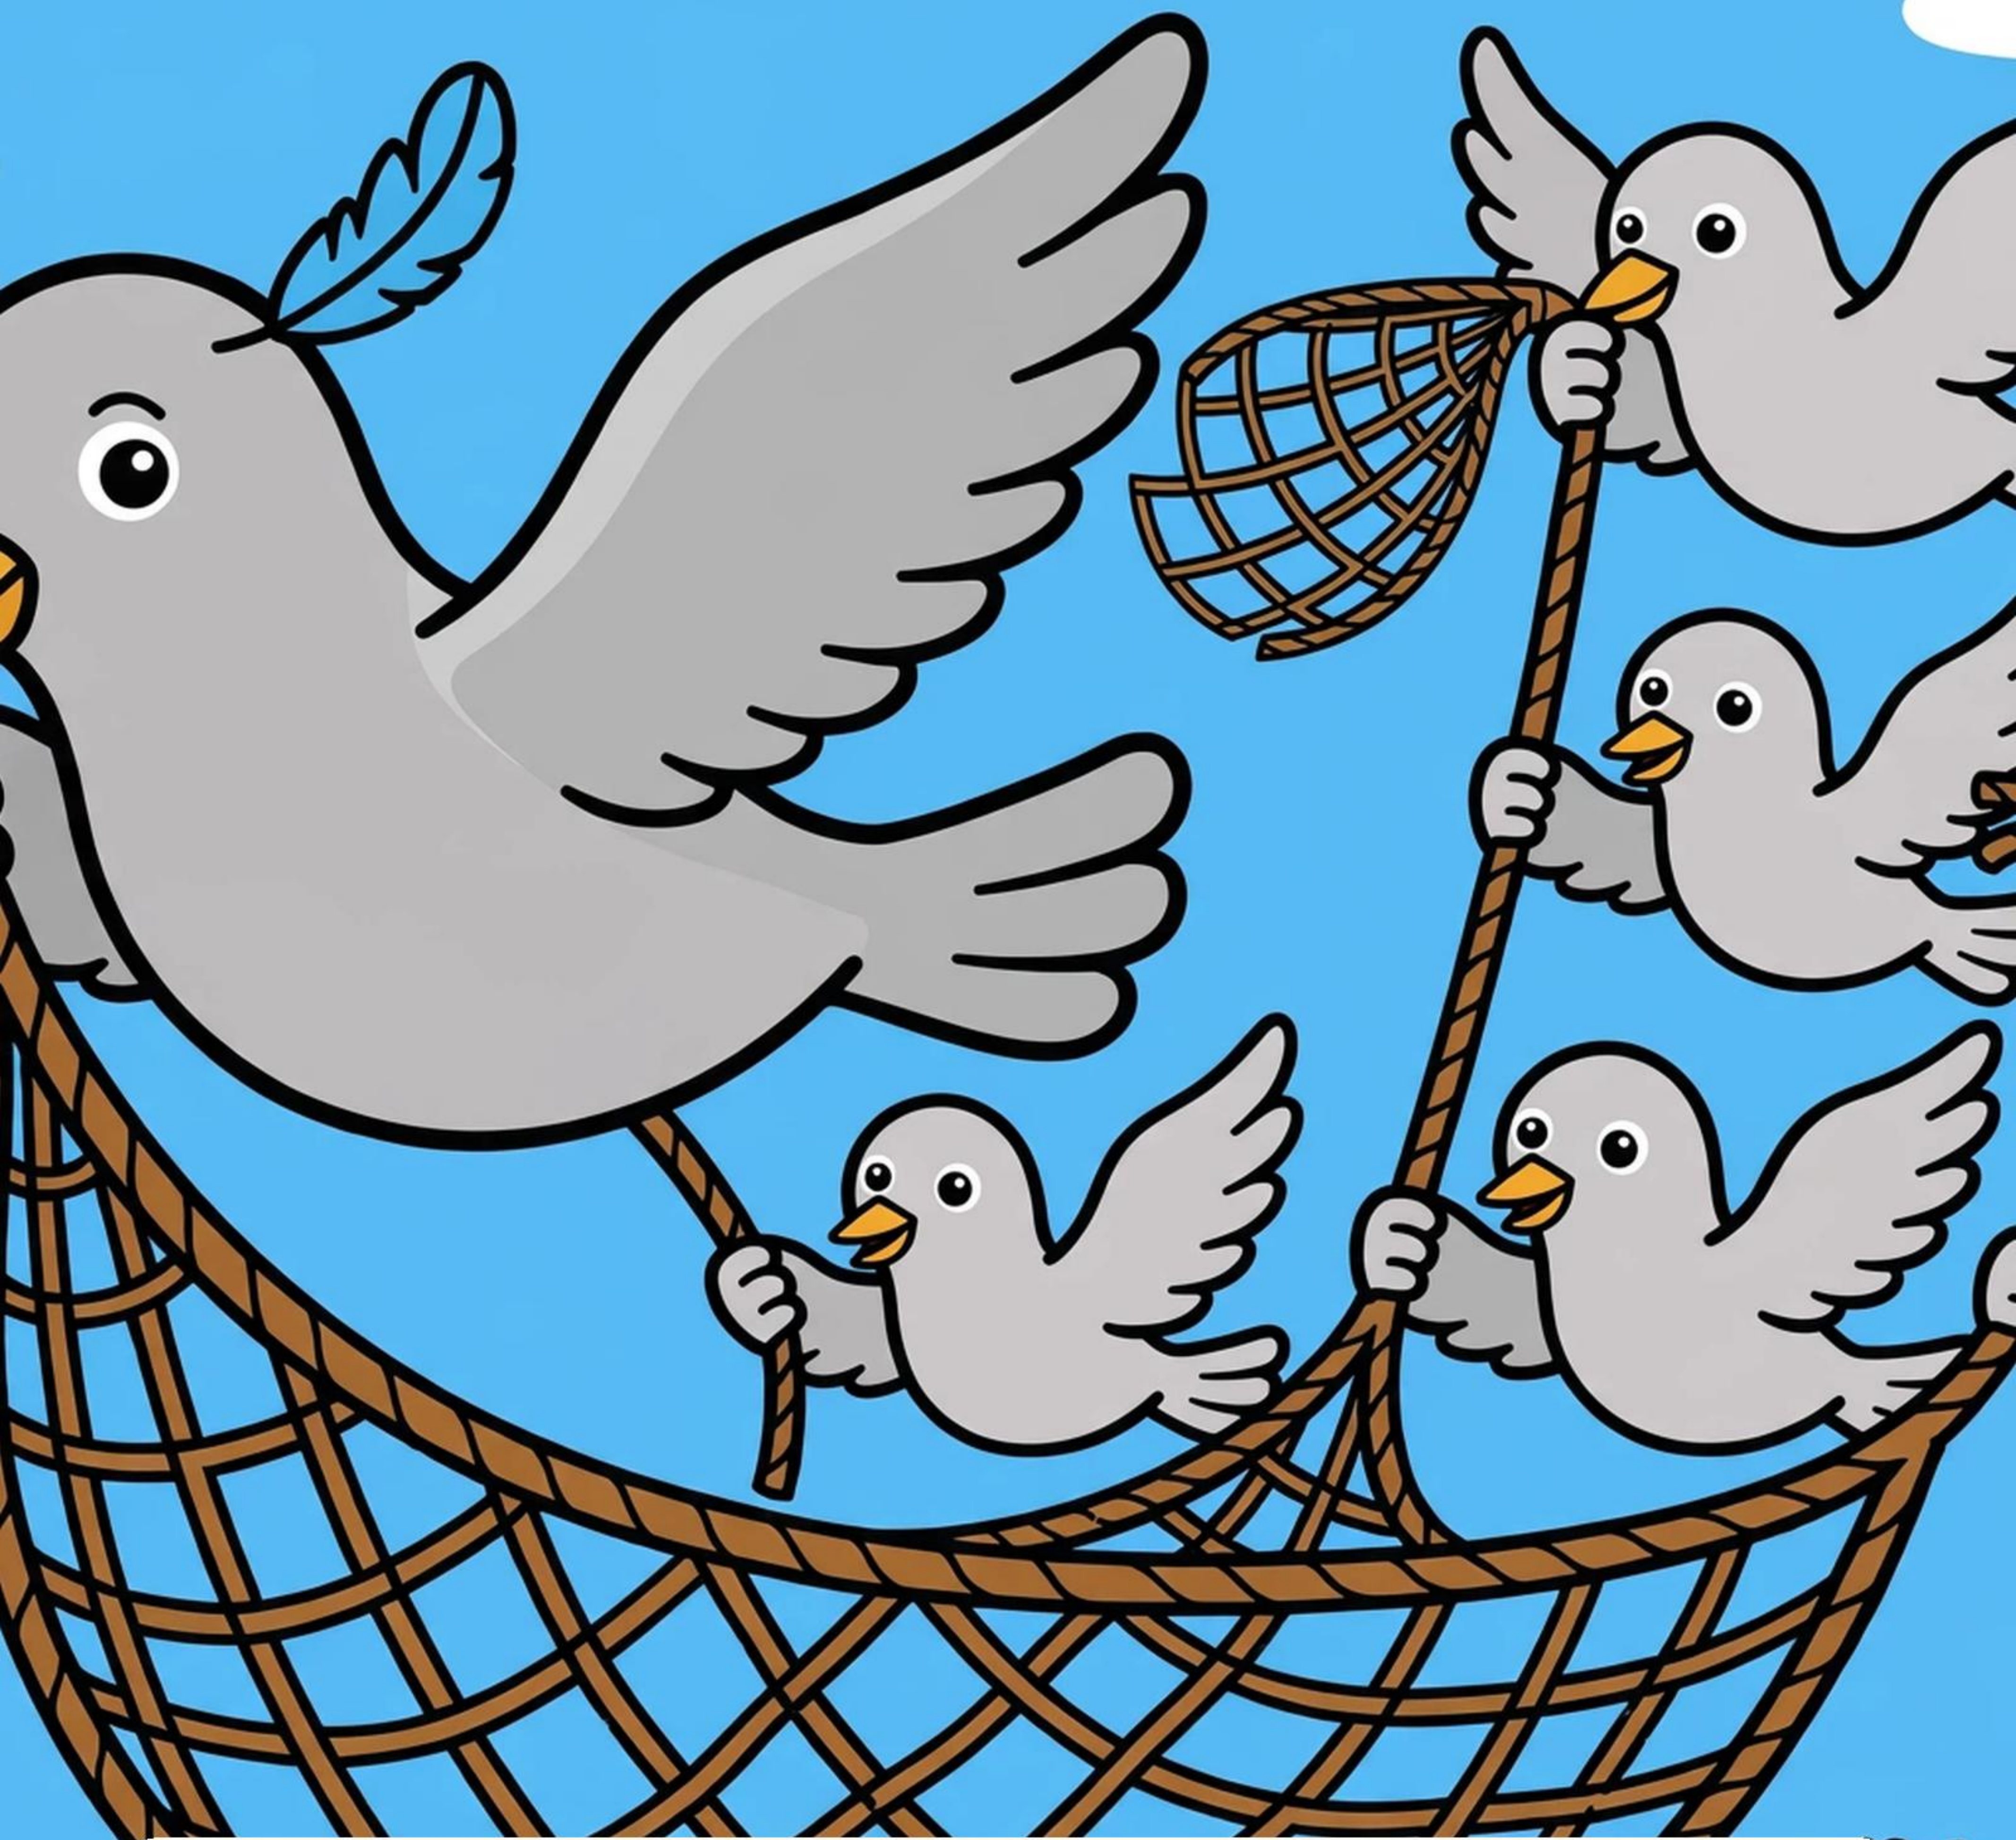

SWISH! A great net fell over them all. They were caught!

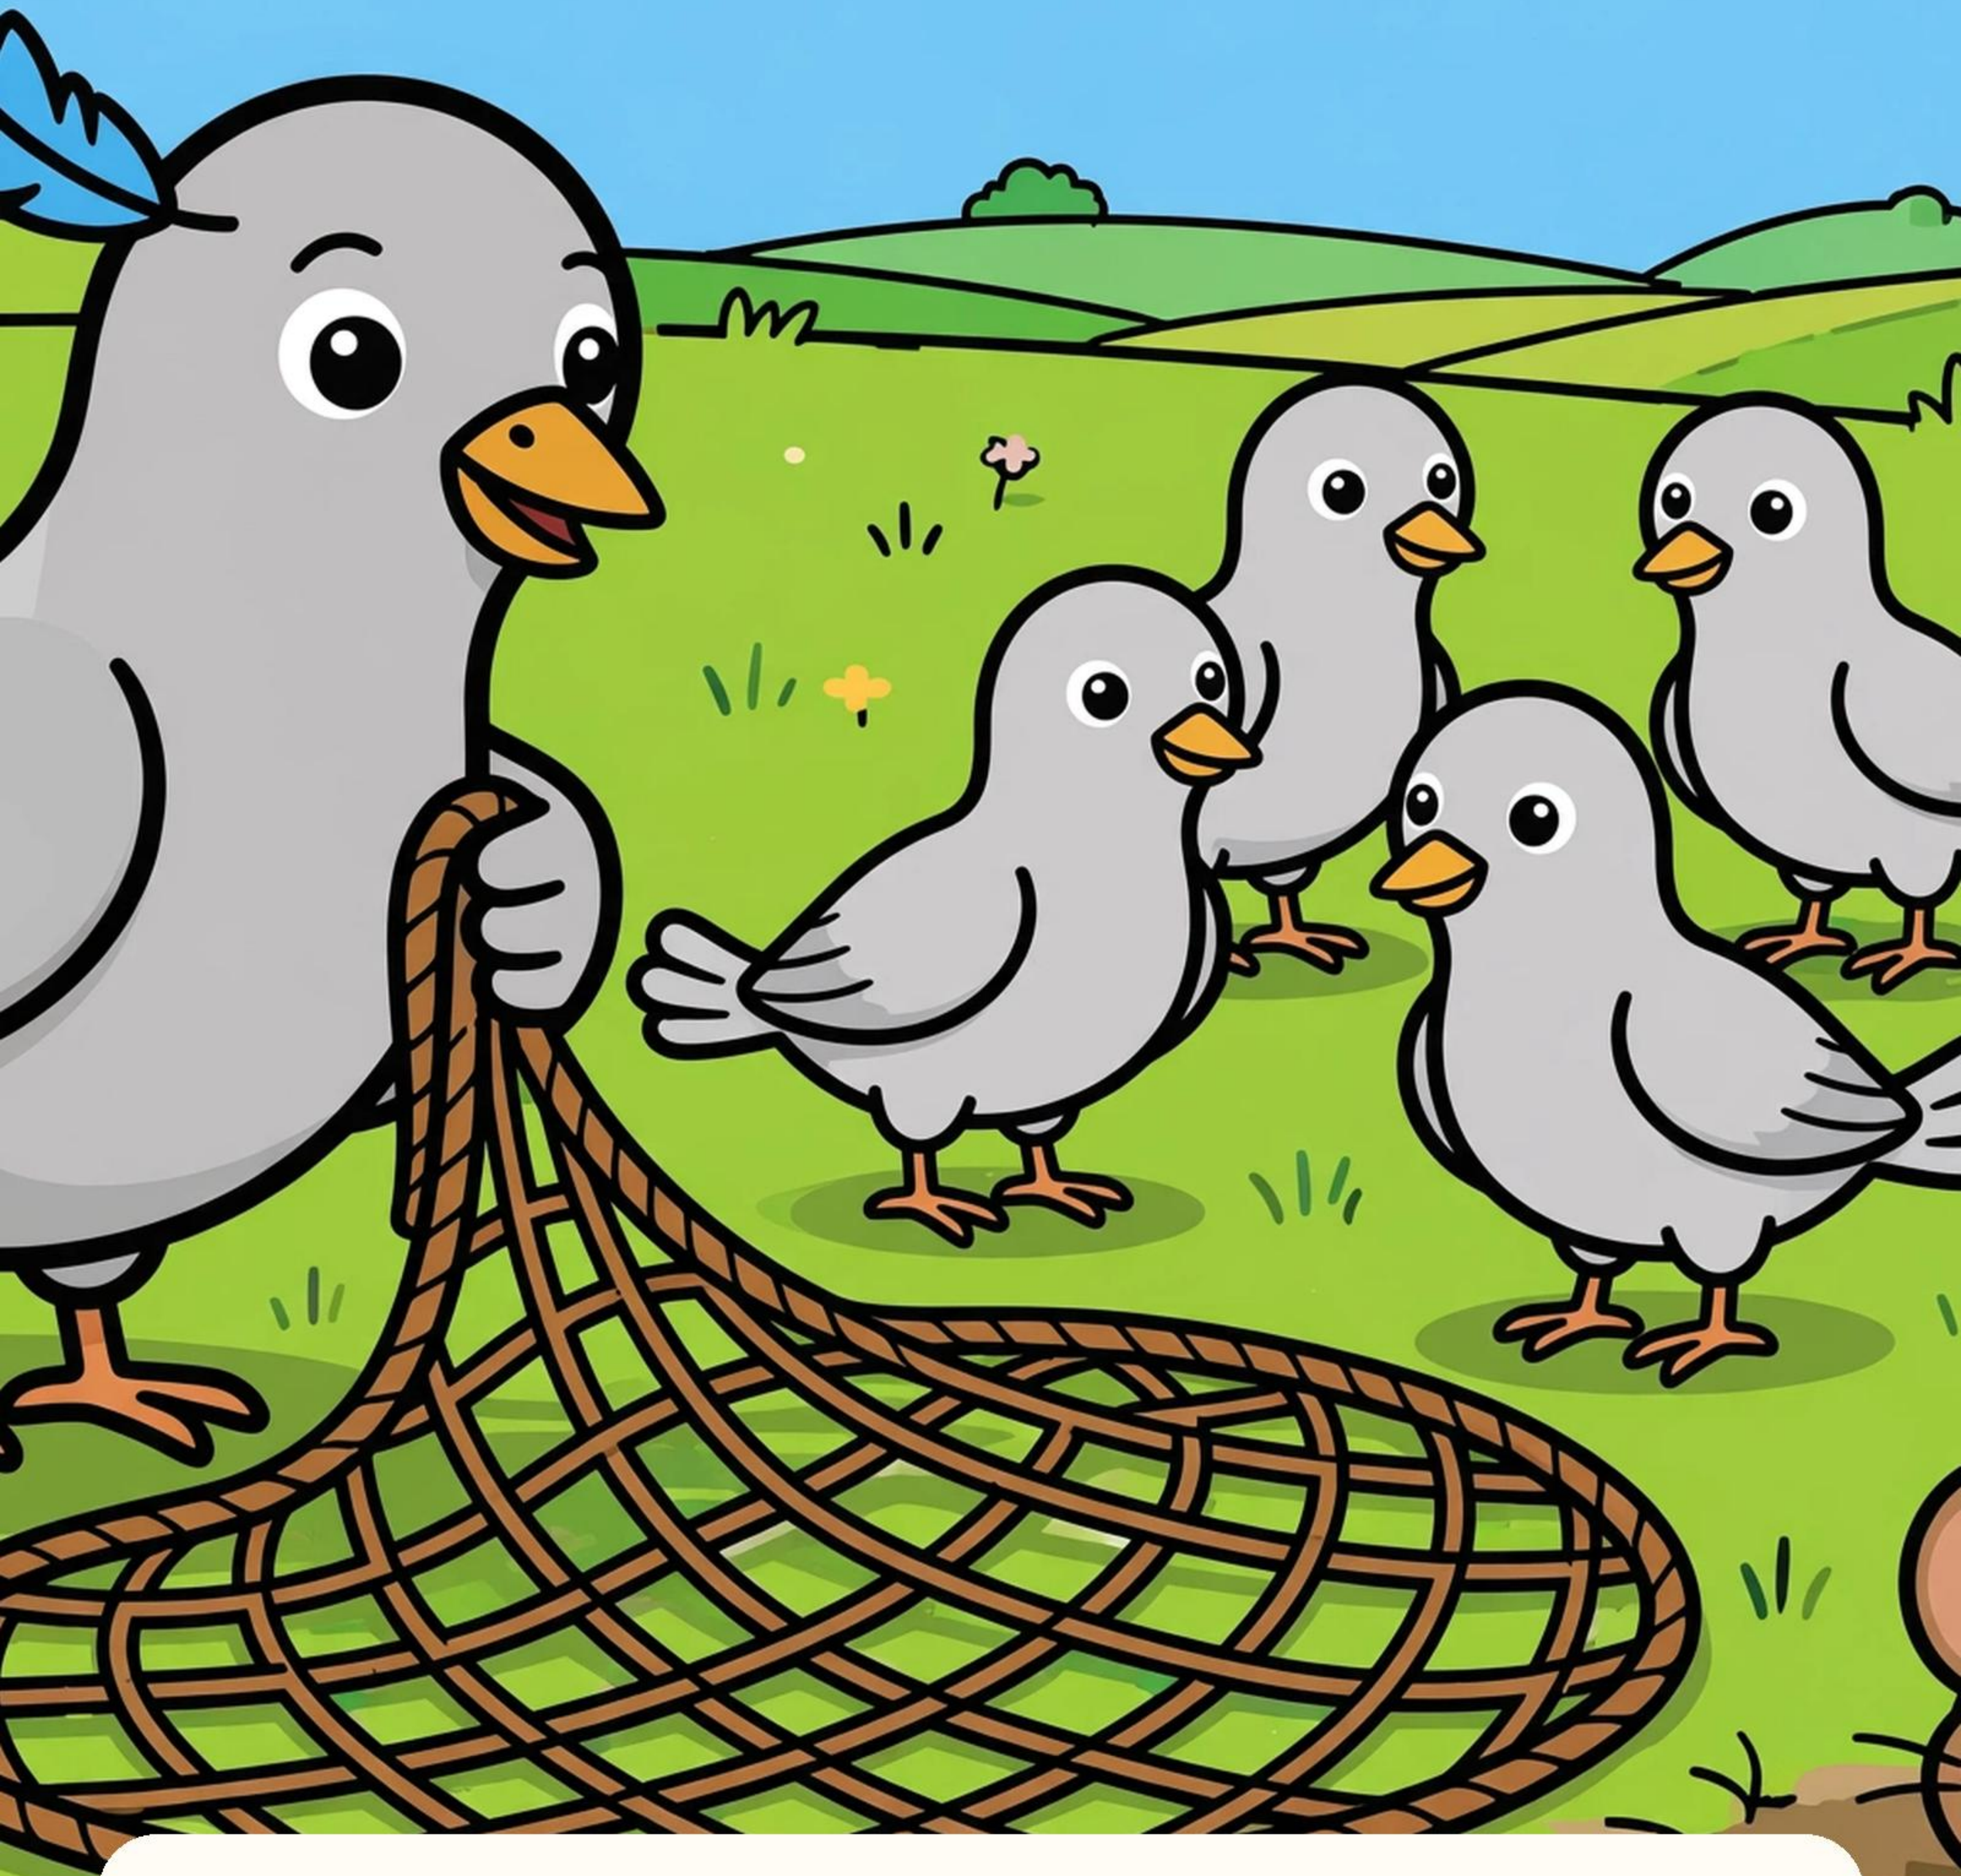

"Help! Let us out!" they cried, flapping and fluttering in a panic. "Stop!" said Kabbu in his calm, strong voice. "If we flap alone, we stay trapped. But if we all fly up together, we can carry the net with us!"

With one great flap-flap-flap, the doves rose into the sky — net and all!

The hunter came running, but the doves flew higher and higher till he gave up and went home. "Now fly to my friend the mouse," said Kabbu. "His sharp little teeth can gnaw through these ropes."

The tiny mouse came out of his hole and nibbled and gnawed — nibble, nibble, gnaw! — till every single dove was free.

And from that day on, the doves and the little mouse were the best of friends.

When we work together as one, no trouble can hold us.
