The Monkey and the Crocodile

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

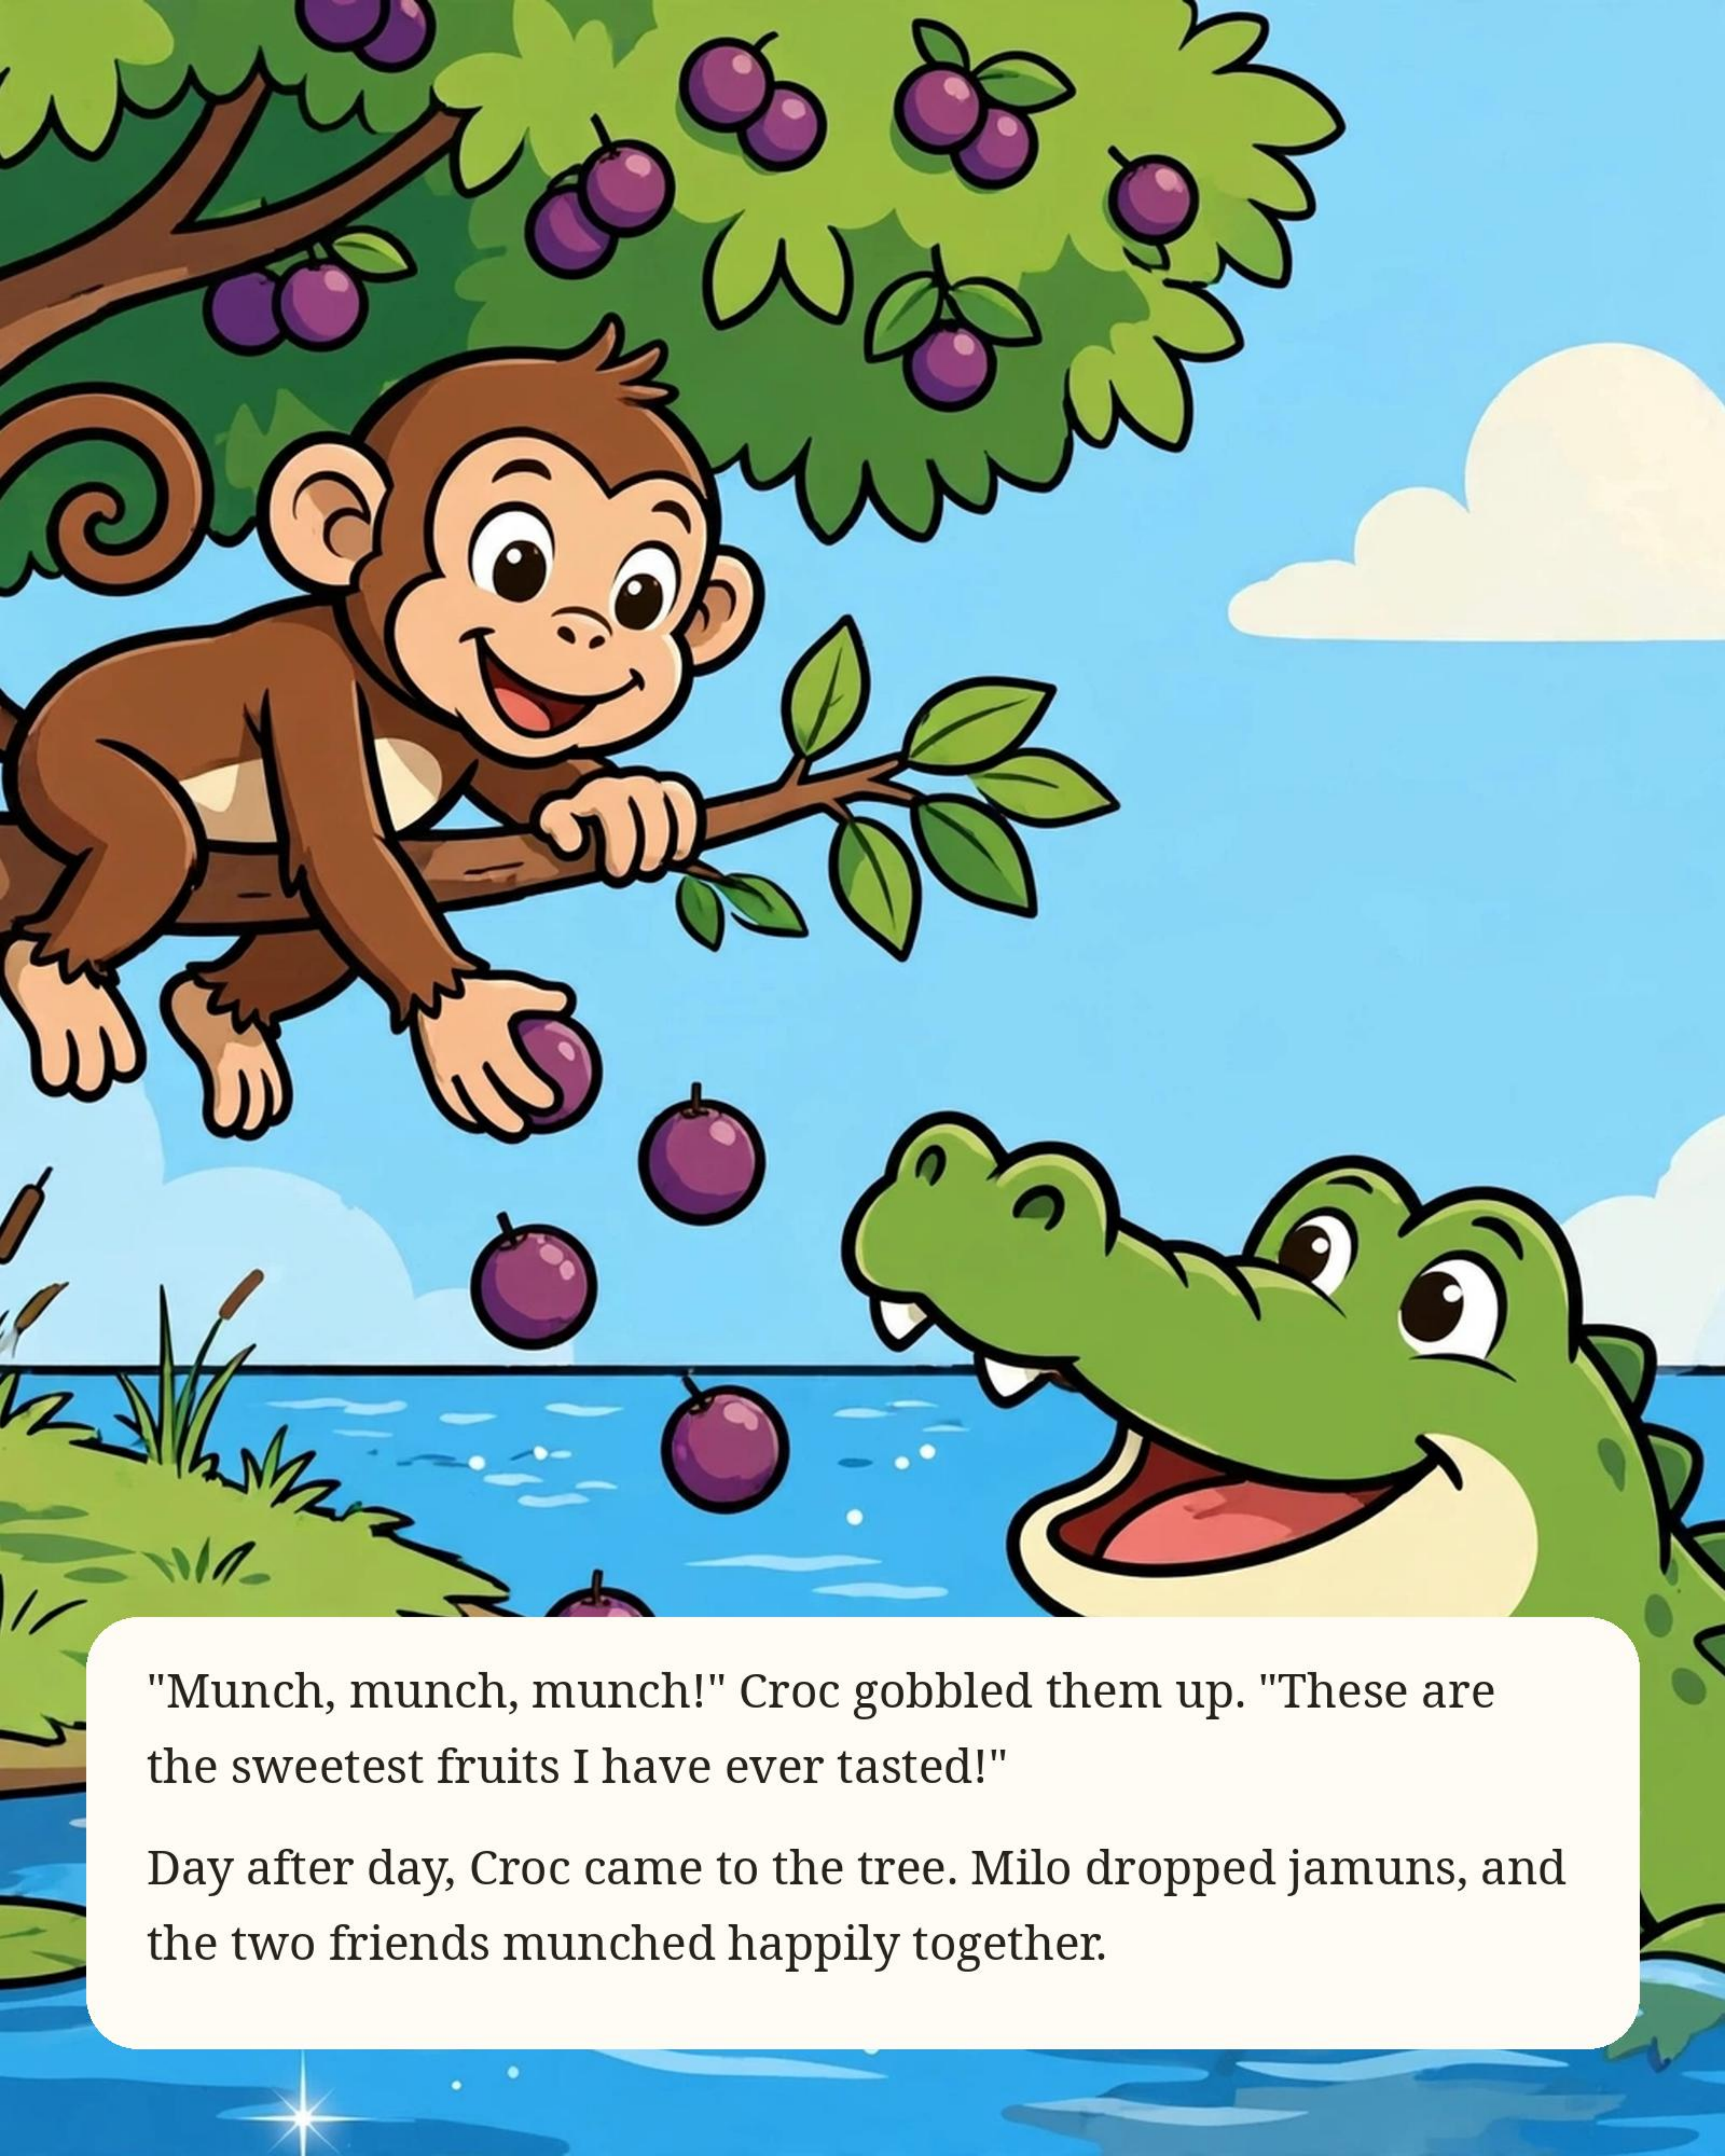

On the bank of a wide blue river stood a big, big jamun tree.
In that tree lived a monkey named Milo. Milo loved the sweet purple jamuns more than anything in the world.

Down in the river lived a crocodile named Croc. One sunny day, Croc swam up to the tree.

"Hello, friend!" said Milo, and he plucked the ripest, juiciest jamuns and tossed them down.

"Munch, munch, munch!" Croc gobbled them up. "These are the sweetest fruits I have ever tasted!"

Day after day, Croc came to the tree. Milo dropped jamuns, and the two friends munched happily together.

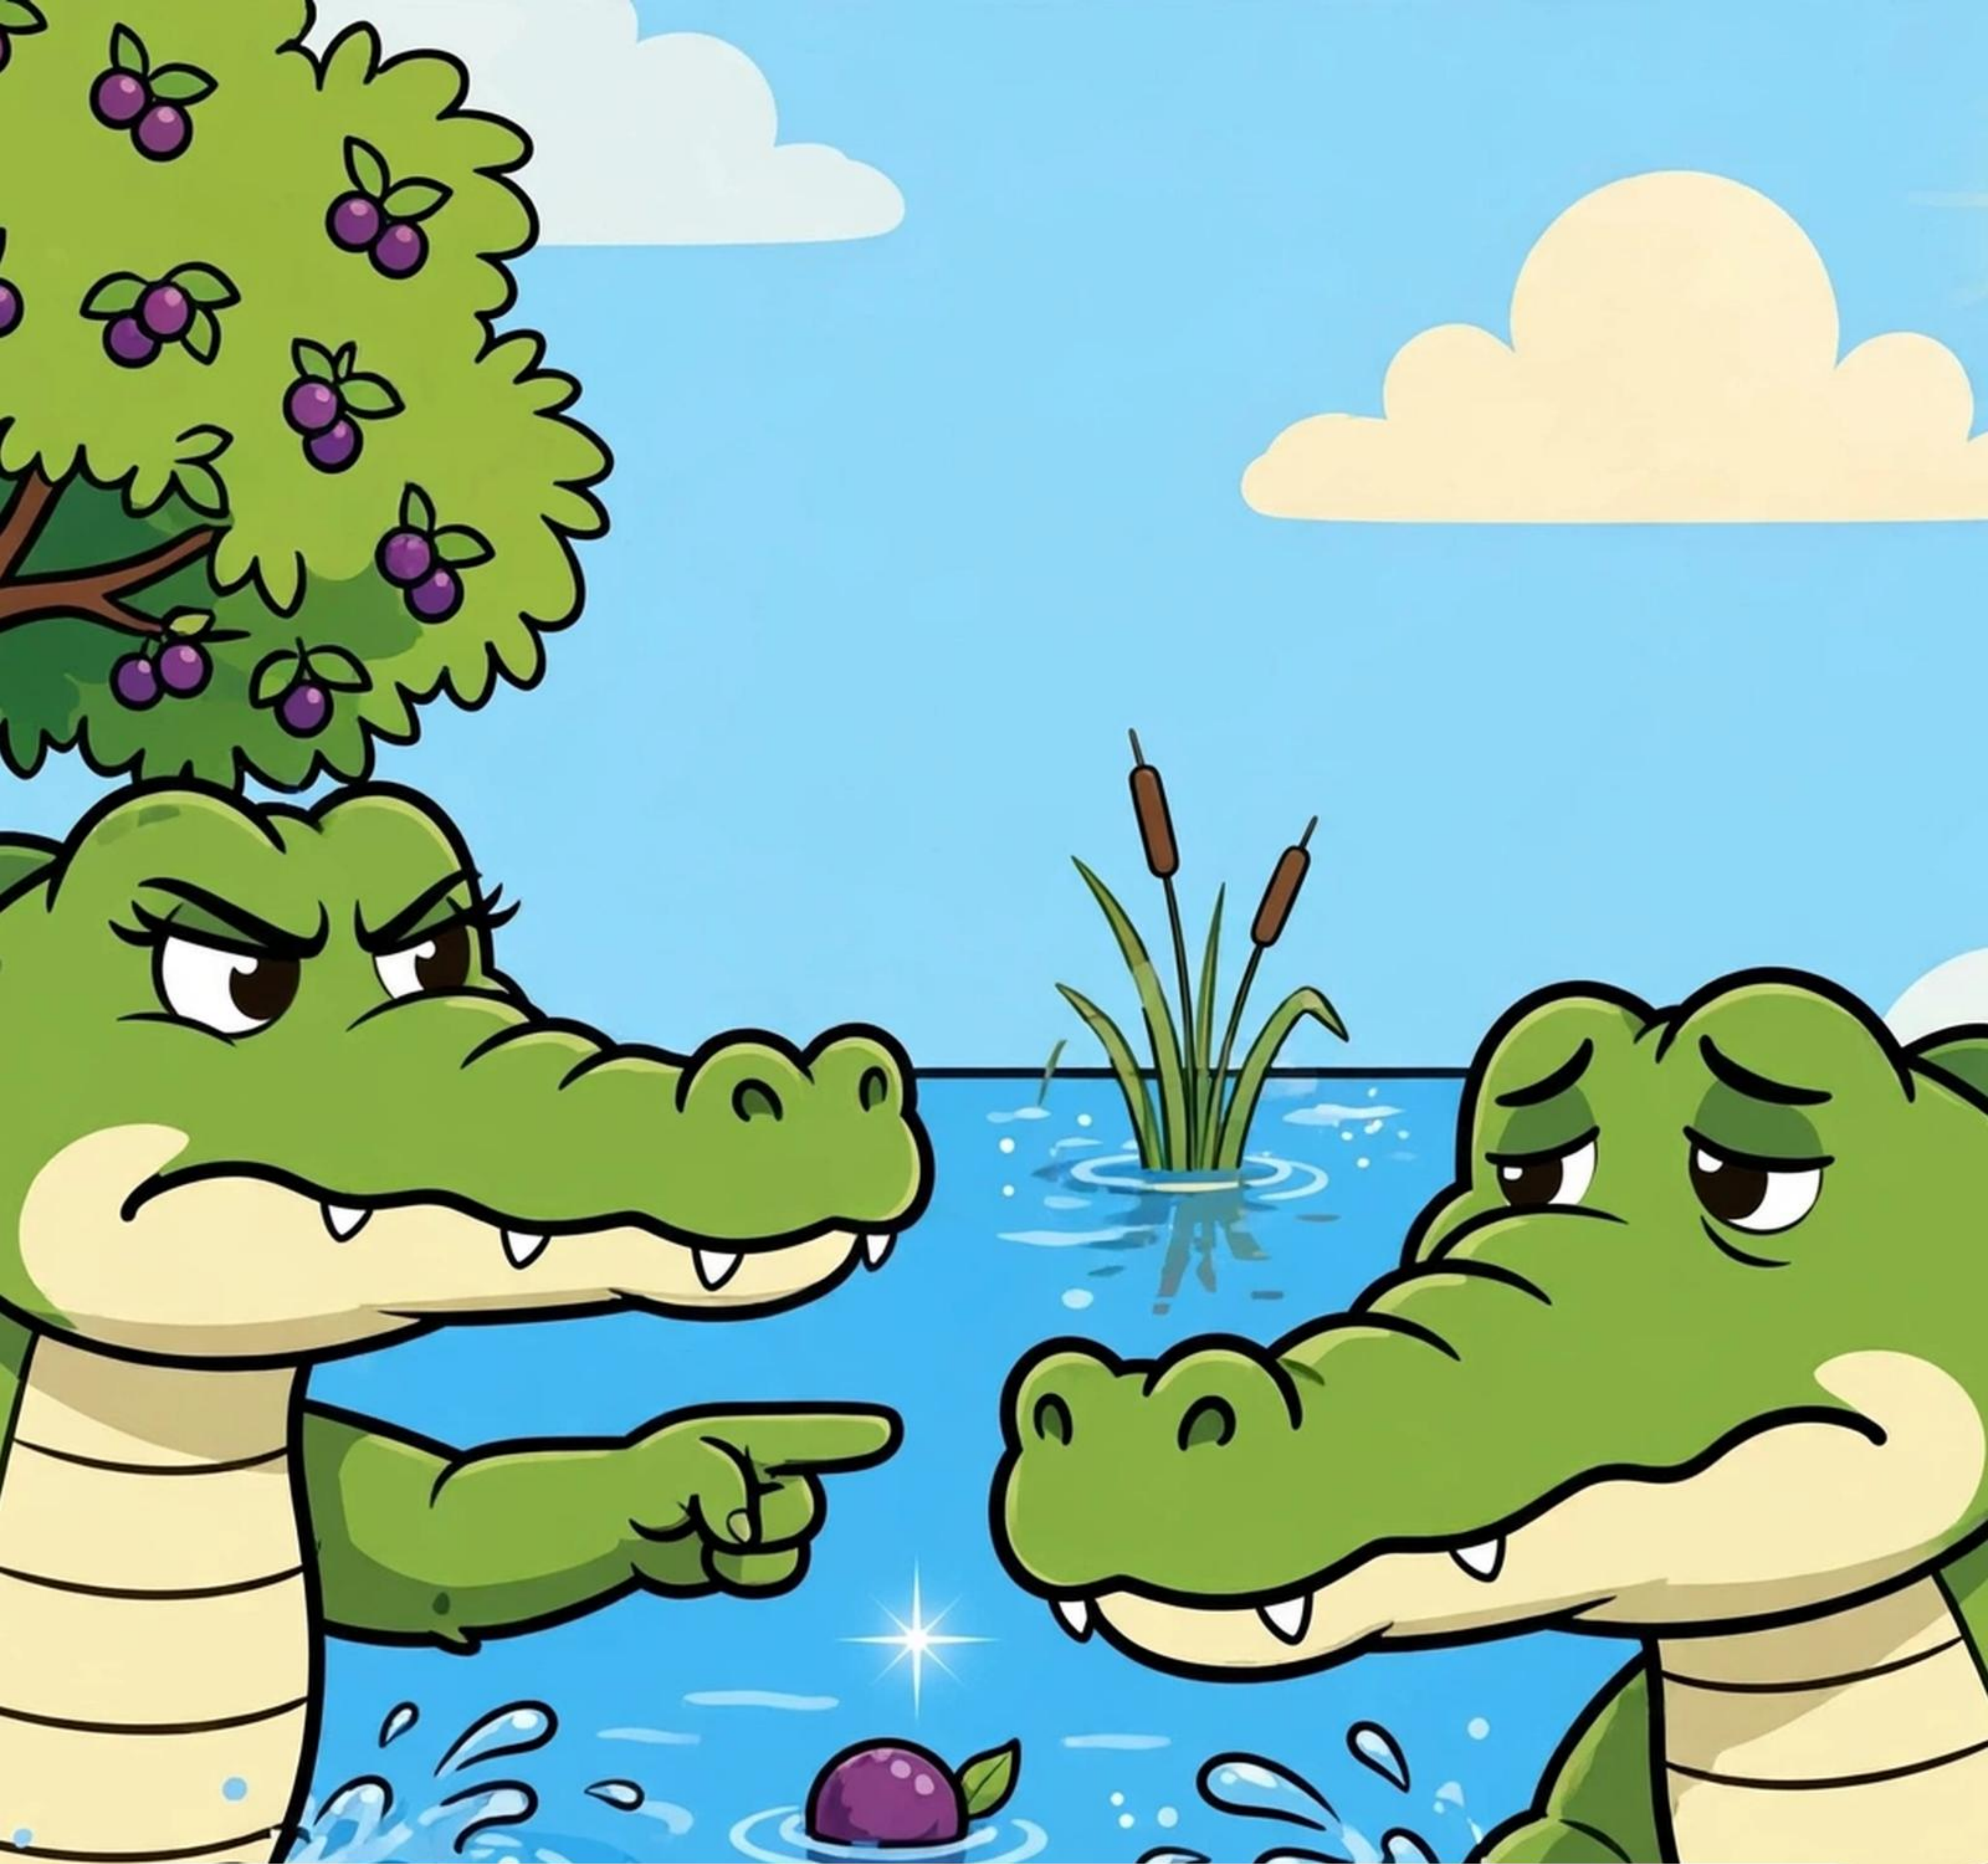

One day, Croc carried some jamuns home to his wife.

His wife ate them and said, "If the jamuns are this sweet, how sweet the monkey's heart must be! I want to eat the monkey's heart!"

Croc felt sad, sad, sad. But he could not say no to his wife. So he called Milo down.

"Come, dear friend," said Croc. "Sit on my back, and I will show you my home across the river."

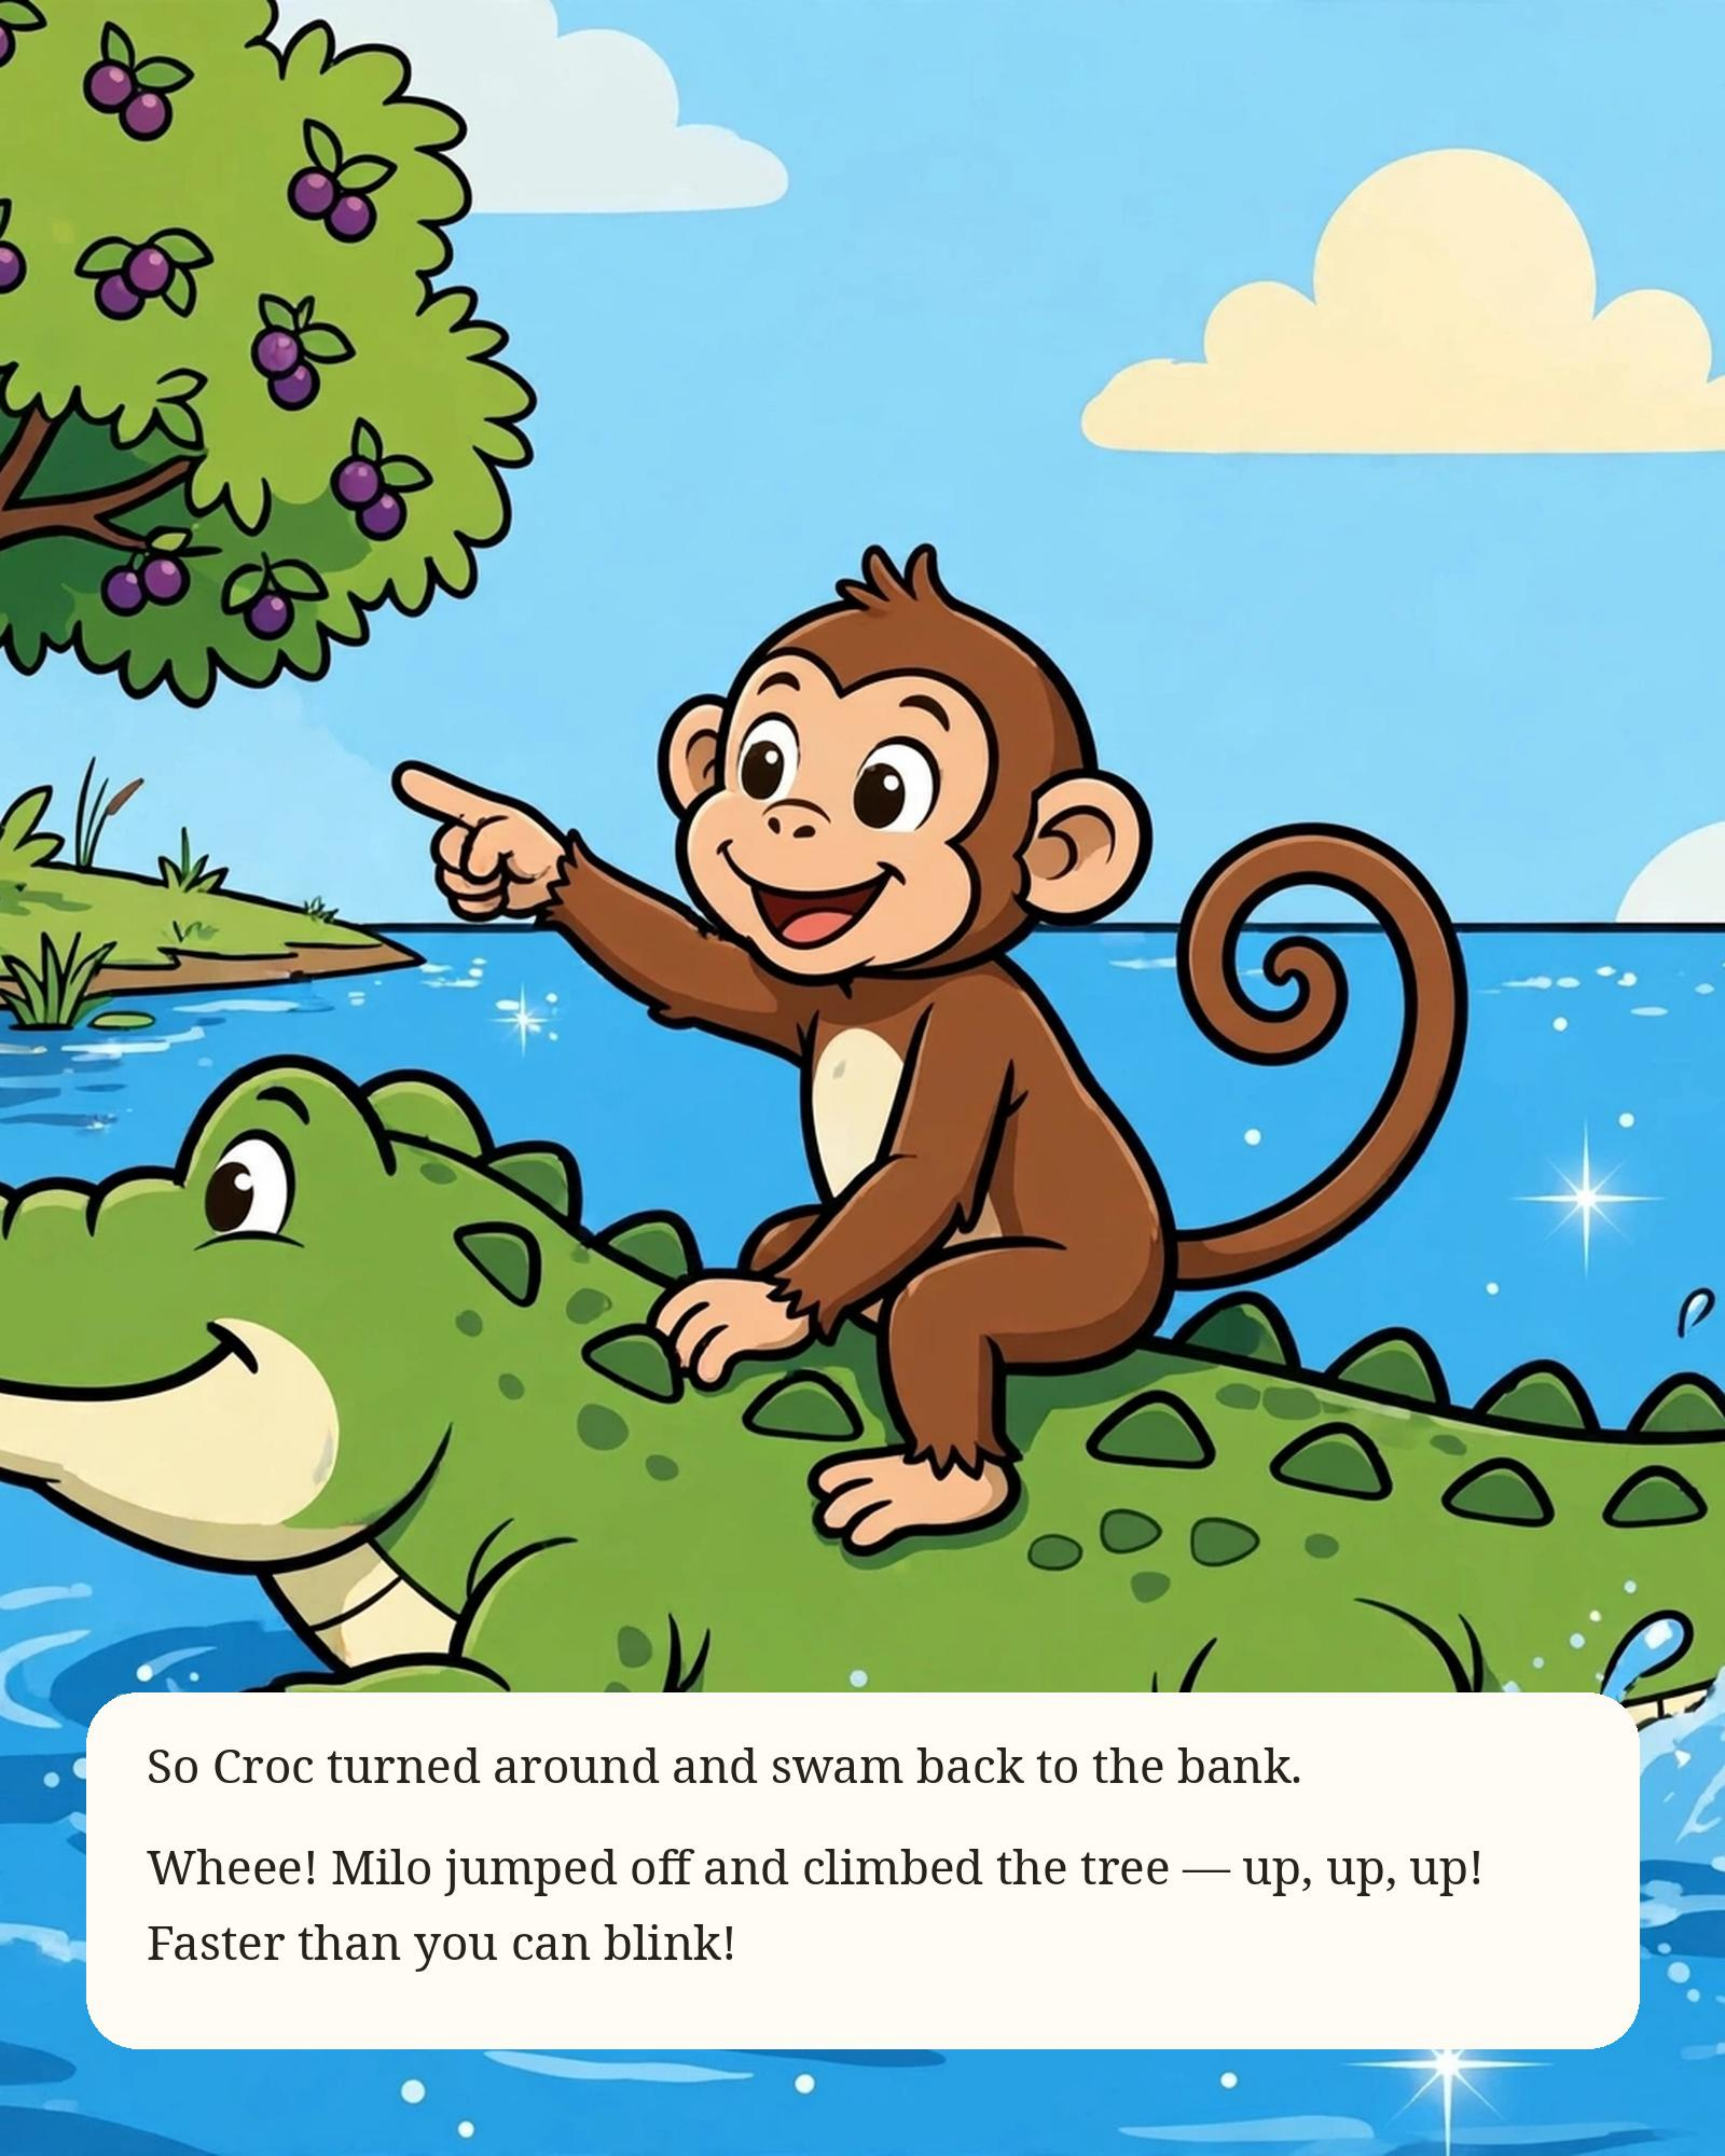

Milo hopped onto Croc's back. Splash, splash! They swam to the middle of the river.

Then Croc said softly, "Friend... my wife wants to eat your heart."

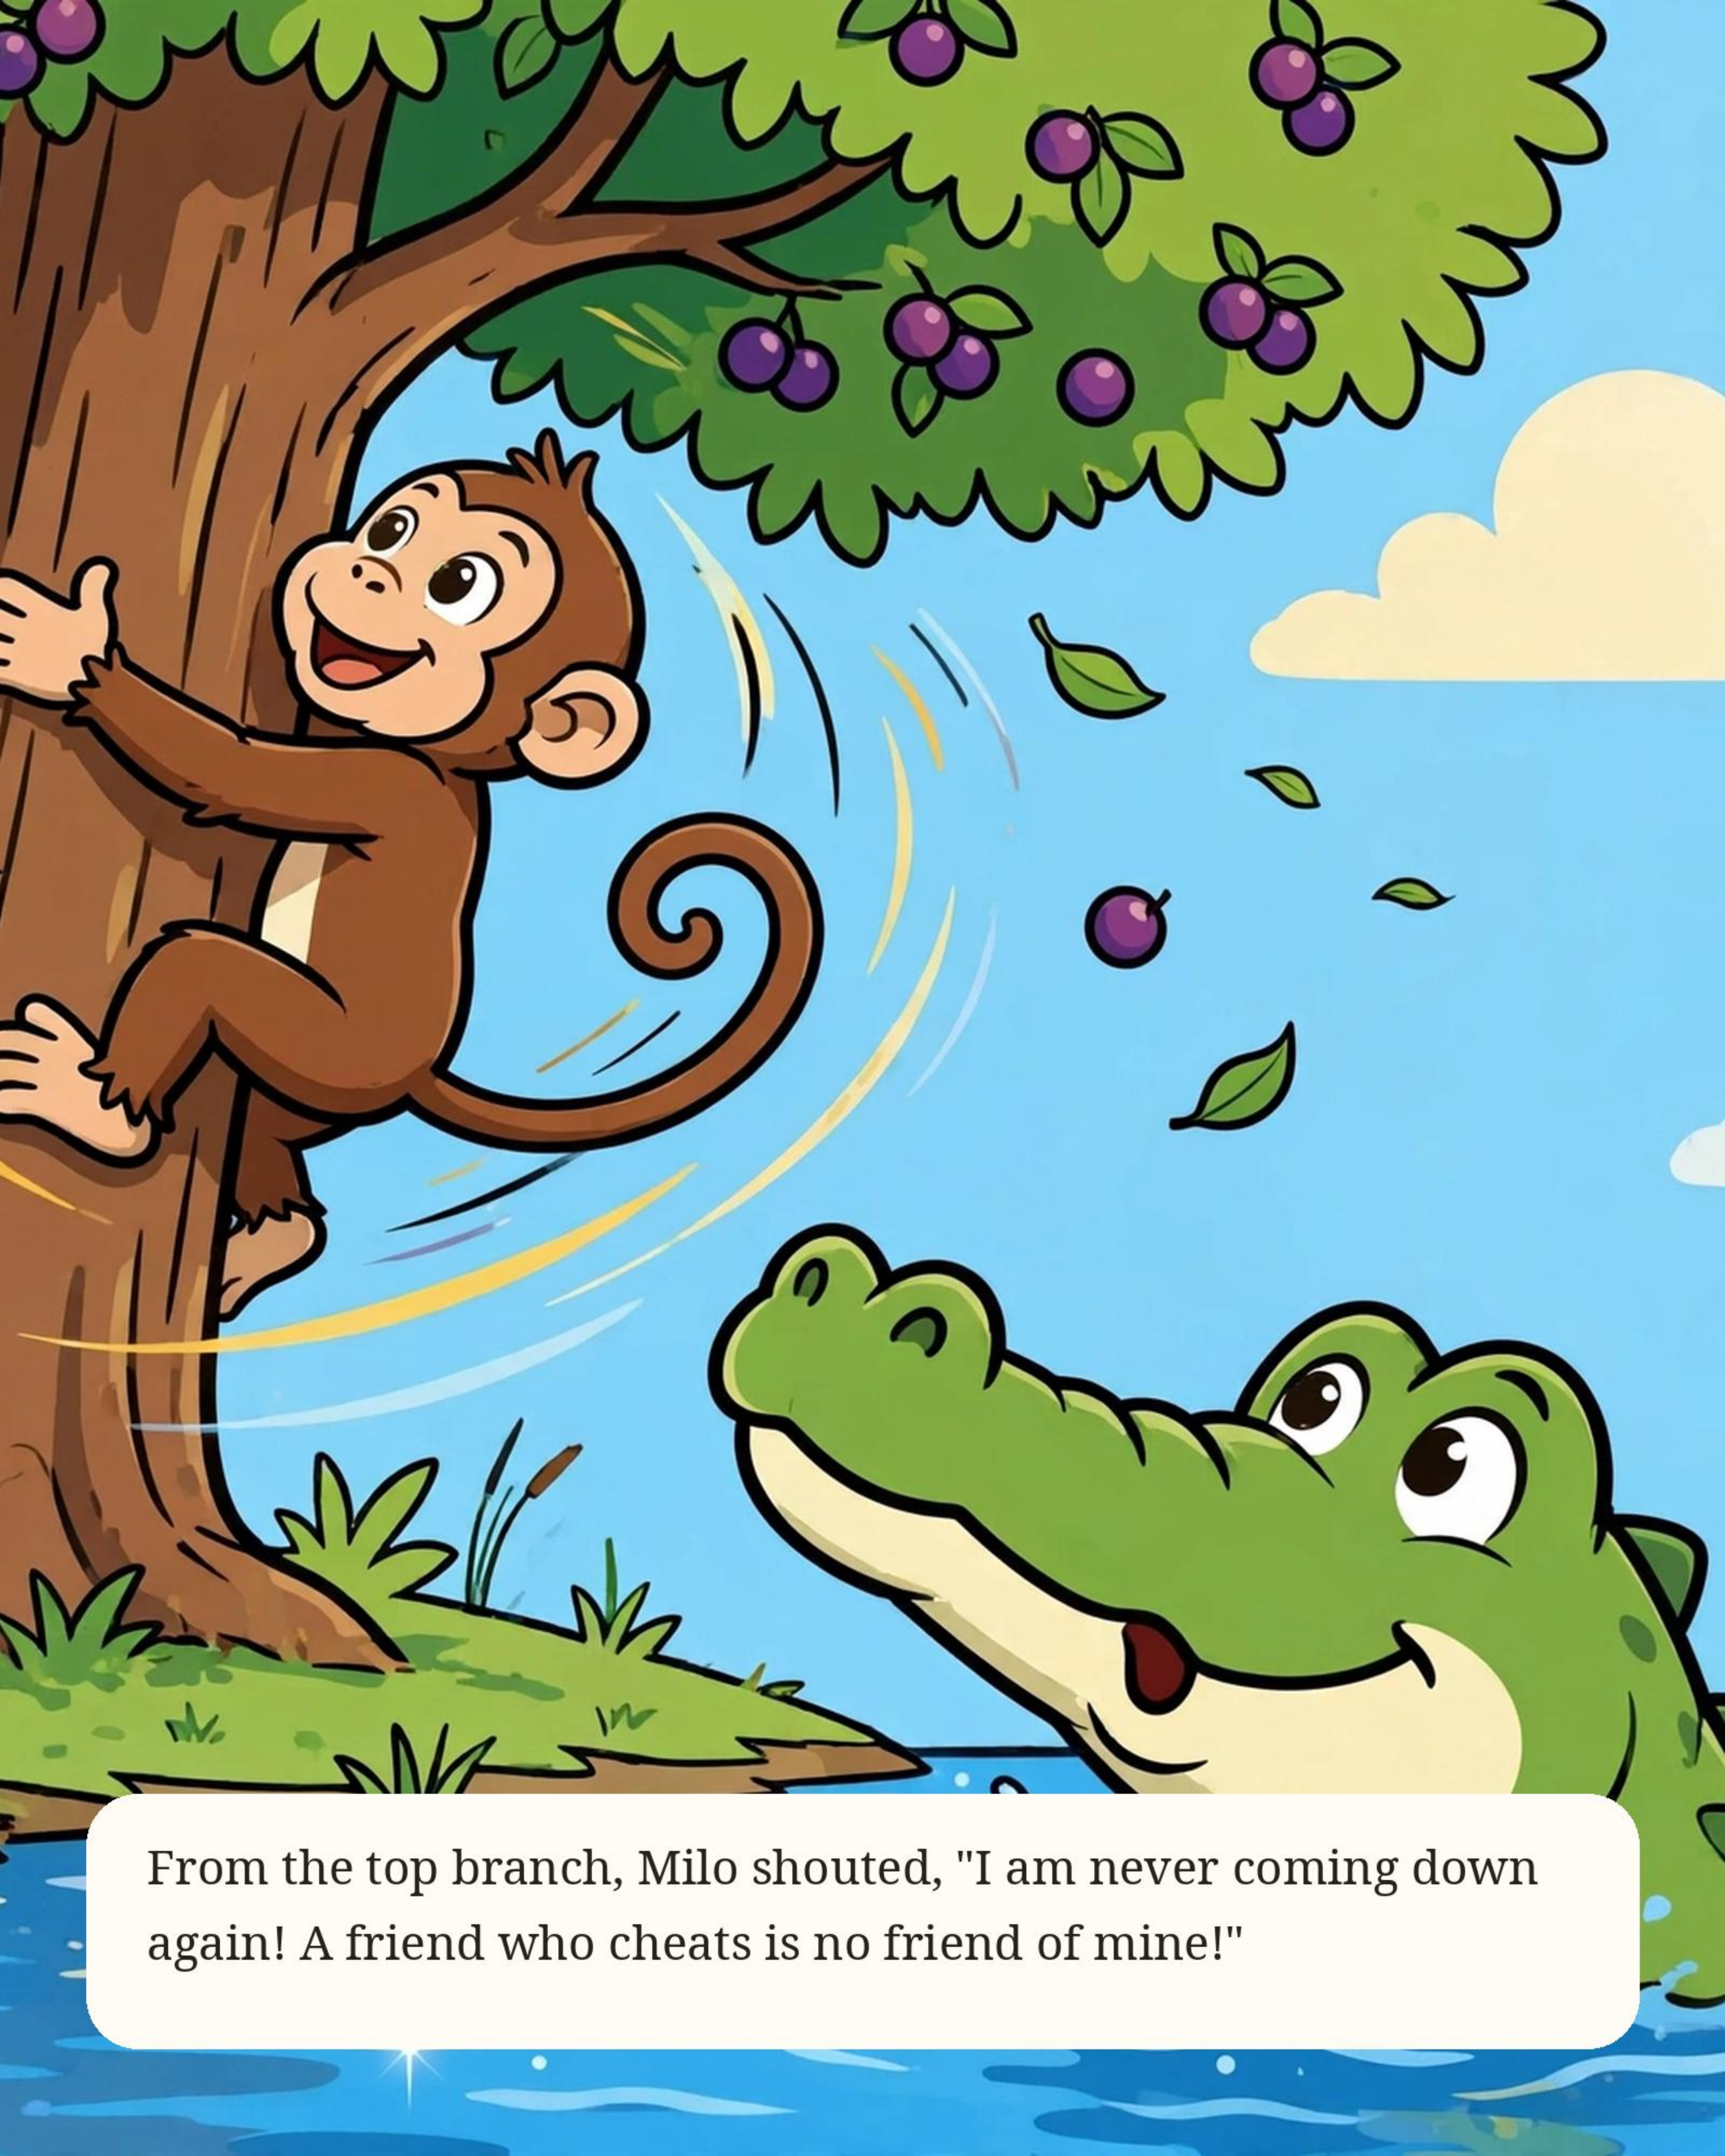

For one moment, Milo's tummy felt wobbly with fright. Then he smiled a big monkey smile.

"Oh! You should have told me before!" said Milo. "I left my heart hanging on my tree! Turn back quickly, and I will fetch it for you."

So Croc turned around and swam back to the bank.

Wheee! Milo jumped off and climbed the tree — up, up, up!
Faster than you can blink!

From the top branch, Milo shouted, "I am never coming down again! A friend who cheats is no friend of mine!"

Croc hung his head and swam slowly home.

Stay calm in trouble — with patience and clever thinking, even the biggest danger passes.
