The Selfless Hare

KIDS BOOK VIDEOS

Long, long ago, in a green and shady forest, lived a kind little hare named Chandu. Chandu was friends with everyone — the chirpy birds, the busy squirrels, and the old tortoise by the pond.

One full-moon night, a tired traveler knocked at Chandu's door.
"I have walked so far," he sighed, "and I am so very hungry."

Chandu's friends hurried to help. The squirrel brought nuts, the birds brought berries, and the tortoise brought juicy roots.

But Chandu had nothing to give. He ate only soft green grass, and grass was no meal for a hungry traveler.

Chandu thought and thought. Then he said, "Dear traveler, please light a small fire. I will give you the only thing I have — myself."

The brave little hare was ready to leap into the flames, so the traveler could eat and be strong again.

"STOP!" cried the traveler. And in a flash of silver light, he was no traveler at all — he was the spirit of the moon himself!

"Your heart is the kindest in all the forest," said the moon spirit. "I will paint your picture upon my face, so the whole world will remember your kindness."

And to this very day, when you look up at the full moon, you can see the kind little hare sitting there, watching over us all.

Goodnight, kind Chandu. Goodnight, sleepy moon.

The kindest gift of all is giving your very best for someone else.
