

The Ant Picnic

An original bedtime story for ages 4–7. Reading time: about 4 minutes.

Kids Book Videos

On a sunny Saturday, Ayaan had a picnic in the park.

He spread his blanket.

He opened his lunchbox.

Sandwiches, apples, and cookies.

Yum.

He felt happy.

Then he saw them.

A line of tiny ants marched across the blanket.

March, march, march.

Ayaan felt surprised.

"Oh no, ants!" he said.

He almost brushed them away.

But then he looked closer.

The ants were carrying crumbs.

Crumbs bigger than their heads!

"Wow," said Ayaan.

He felt curious.

He watched the first ant.

It carried a bread crumb.

He watched the second ant.

It carried a cookie crumb.

He watched the third ant.

It carried an apple bit.

"They are having a picnic too," giggled Ayaan.

"Picnic, picnic, picnic," he said.

That was three times he said it.

He felt delighted.

Ayaan had an idea.

He was kind, not scared.

He placed three tiny crumbs at the edge of the blanket.

One for the bread ant.

One for the cookie ant.

One for the apple ant.

"Here you go," he said softly.

The ants found the crumbs.

They wiggled their antennae.

Wiggle, wiggle.

It looked like they were saying thank you.

Ayaan felt warm inside.

He ate his sandwich.

The ants ate their crumbs.

Everyone picnicked together.

Then the littlest ant got lost.

It wandered in circles.

Round and round.

Ayaan felt worried.

"Are you lost, little one?" he whispered.

He laid a trail of tiny crumbs.

The little ant followed the trail.

Crumb, crumb, crumb.

Back to its friends!

Ayaan felt proud.

He had helped.

As the sun grew low, Ayaan packed up.

"Goodbye, ants," he said.

"Goodbye, goodbye, goodbye."

That was three times he said it.

He felt peaceful.

That night, Ayaan dreamed of marching ants.

Sleep now, little picnicker.

Dream of tiny parades on green grass.

Moral: Kindness comes in all sizes, even crumb-sized.*

The End