Fia the fawn heard whispering outside her window. Shh-shh-shh went the trees. It sounded like secrets. She felt scared. What were the trees saying?

She hid under her blanket. The whispering continued. Shh-shh-shh. It would not stop. Fia felt frightened. Her heart beat fast.

Her father came in. He sat on her bed. "What is wrong, little one?" he asked.

"The trees are whispering," said Fia in a tiny voice. "I think they are talking about me."

Father smiled gently. "Let us listen together," he said. He opened the window a crack. They both listened.

Shh-shh-shh went the leaves. It was soft and rhythmic. It did not sound angry. It sounded... cozy. Like a story being told.

"Trees whisper, leaves listen, bedtime stories softly glisten," sang Father quietly.

Fia listened closer. The whispering had a pattern. It rose and fell like a voice. It really did sound like storytelling! Fia felt curious now.

"Trees whisper, leaves listen, bedtime stories softly glisten," sang Father again.

"The trees are telling bedtime stories," said Fia. She felt amazed. "To their leaves! The leaves are their babies."

"Exactly," said Father. "Every night, the trees tell stories. About the sun. About the rain. About growing tall and strong."

Fia was not scared anymore. She felt peaceful. She imagined the trees tucking their leaves in. She imagined the leaves yawning tiny leaf yawns.

"Trees whisper, leaves listen, bedtime stories softly glisten," sang Father one last time.

Fia snuggled into her bed. The whispering trees sang her to sleep. Shh-shh-shh. It was the gentlest sound in the world.

Her eyes grew heavy. She dreamed she was a little leaf. A kind tree told her stories. It rocked her in the breeze.

Sleep now, little fawn. The trees are telling their stories. Listen, and let their whispers carry you to sleep.

Moral: Strange sounds become sweet once you learn they come from love.
